Correspondence with the United States Ambassador respecting the Treatment of British Prisoners of War and Interned Civilians in Germany.

[In continuation of "Miscellaneous, No. 15 (1915)."]

No. 1.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and has the honour to state that he has been informed that there are a number of British prisoners of war at the citadel at Lille who, it is feared, are undergoing great hardships.

Sir E. Grey would be grateful if Mr. Page would request the United States Ambassador at Berlin to make any enquiries he can in regard to the matter.

Foreign Office, May 24, 1915.

No. 2.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and has the honour to inform his Excellency that letters have been received from a British officer who is a wounded prisoner of war at Frankfurt, complaining that although until recently he has been kindly treated and well attended to medically since he has been allowed to be out of bed, to which he had been confined for a period of 176 days, his treatment has gradually become worse, until he has been compelled to make a formal protest to the German authorities.

The officer in question states that he and the other wounded officers are insulted daily by the privates and orderlies as they pass from their rooms to the court-yard into which they are admitted for two hours each day. When the officers reach the court-yard they are subjected to being constantly pelted with filth by the public, who make use of an open grille for this purpose. The German authorities appear to have taken no steps to stop the outrage.

During the portion of the day which is not spent in the court-yard this officer is confined to a small room where the temperature during the hot weather is well over 80°, and as a consequence of his weak condition he suffers acutely from the heat, and suffers from increasing pains in the head, while his eye, which was seriously affected, gets no better, and he is stone-deaf in one ear.

In addition to the unjustifiable hardships enumerated above, the officer states that he is being starved, and implores his friends in this country to send him constant supplies of food, as he is not allowed to purchase food except jam in Germany with his own money.

In informing Mr. Page of the substance of the complaints referred to, Sir E. Grey wishes to point out that such accounts of the treatment of British prisoners of war cannot fail to arouse in this country anxiety and indignation, which had to some extent been allayed by the reports furnished by Mr. Gerard on many of the detention camps in Germany, and he would therefore be grateful if Mr. Page would inform Mr. Gerard by telegraph of the substance of the complaints, and request his Excellency to bring the matter to the attention of the German Government with a view to securing for the British officers concerned the treatment which is demanded alike by humanity and international obligations. Sir E. Grey would be greatly obliged if it were possible for a member of the American Embassy at Berlin to visit as soon as possible the British wounded officers at Frankfurt.

Foreign Office, June 12, 1915.

No. 3.

Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London, to Sir Edward Grey.—(Received June 27.)

THE American Ambassador presents his compliments to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and, with reference to Sir Edward Grey's note of the 12th instant* relative to the treatment of a certain wounded British officer and other British officers at Frankfurt-on-Main, has the honour to acquaint Sir Edward Grey with the purport of a telegram just received from the Ambassador at Berlin, through the Department of State in Washington, to the effect that the British wounded prisoners at Frankfurt-on-Main have just been visited by Dr. Ohnesorg, who states that he found there two officers in the second reserve hospital, namely, Major R. Archibald Birley, of the Field Artillery, and Captain John Macdonald Henderson, of the London Scottish Regiment; also a man, Private John Rose, of the Lancashire Fusiliers.

Dr. Ohnesorg reports that the officers are satisfied with their treatment, and have no complaint to make. They occupy a large room, which is well ventilated and well lighted, and are daily taken out into the grounds of the hospital. Two other British officers previously there have been discharged, and are now interned in the officers' camp at Friedburg.

Private Rose is found to be well treated, and states he has no complaint to make.

No. 4.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and has the honour to state that he is informed that the conditions obtaining at Würzburg camp are very unsatisfactory. The Secretary of State understands that there are five Englishmen at this camp, four officers and one civilian, and that there are a large number of French officers, the accommodation being very limited.

The Secretary of State would be grateful if Mr. Page would kindly request the United States Ambassador at Berlin, if possible, to depute a member of his staff to visit this camp at an early date. His Excellency might, perhaps, be able to secure the transfer of the British officers to some other officers' camp, where the conditions are more satisfactory, and of the civilian to Ruhleben.

Foreign Office, June 29, 1915.

No. 5.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to Sir E. Grey's note of the 12th ultimo† respecting the treatment of British prisoners of war at Frankfurt-on-Main and to his Excellency's note of the 26th ultimo‡ in reply thereto, has the honour to observe that Dr. Ohnesorg's report appears to contain no reference to the complaints about the recreation ground referred to in Sir E. Grey's note of the 12th ultimo. Sir E. Grey† would be very grateful if Mr. Page would draw the attention of the United States Ambassador at Berlin to this point, in order that Mr. Gerard may cause further investigation to be made into the matter, should opportunity offer.

Enclosure 1 in No. 6.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, June 24, 1915.

REFERRING to my letter of 28th April, 1915, in which was enclosed a copy of new German regulations in regard to the maintenance of prisoners of war, I have the honour to inform you that, as already mentioned casually in reports in regard to visits made to camps where prisoners of war are interned, a course of instruction was given several weeks ago to a large number of German non-commissioned officers and soldiers who had been selected from those who had already been on duty or were to be sent to the various camps for work in connection with the management of the kitchens. Since the general introduction of the self-management system in feeding the prisoners, under the auspices of these men, there has been much improvement in the food both as regards quantity and quality. The contract system is being done away with.

In continuation of the plan to administer the prisoners' camps on systematic lines, a course of instruction was arranged by the Prussian Ministry of War, which is now going on in Berlin. To attend this course about 150 "Verpflegungsoffiziere" (commissariat-officers) have been specially selected. The course itself comprises sixteen lectures on subjects having to do with camp administration, in particular with regard to the commissariat ("Ernährung"), kitchen and canteen organisation, and providing occupation for the prisoners. By invitation, together with the Spanish Ambassador, who is charged with the protection of Belgian, French, and Russian interests, I attended one of these lectures to-day and found it most interesting and instructive.

This course of lectures is to last four days (to-day was the third) and each day a luncheon is provided showing the average character, and quantity, of the food given to the prisoners. A copy of the menu for to-day is enclosed herewith, which shows the exact nature of the food provided and its scientific composition. I tasted the samples of food provided for the morning and midday meals, and was assured by Mr. Jackson who accompanied me that it was exactly similar to that which he had tasted frequently on his visits to prisoners' camps. The quantity provided seemed ample, and the food itself was palatable. The obvious objections from an English point of view is that, as knives are not permitted in the camps, the food is always prepared so as to be eaten with a spoon, and consequently there are no large pieces of meat or fish, but otherwise it seems to me that no exception could properly be taken to it.

I should be glad to have you bring the foregoing to the attention of the British Government. The German military authorities have now satisfied themselves that German prisoners in England are being treated as well as the conditions admit (except with regard to the confinement on board ships, which is still a sore point), and they are showing every disposition to treat British prisoners (both officers and men) in the most favourable manner possible, and to pay attention to their wishes in so far as can be done consistently with the principle that all the prisoners (of whom there are considerably more than 1,000,000) must be treated in practically the same manner. As a concrete instance of this I may mention the fact that all the British prisoners at Ohrdruf (compare report of visit to that camp, dated 24th April†) have now been brought together into the compound where there is a place for football.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

No. 7.

Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London, to Sir Edward Grey.—(Received July 7.)

THE American Ambassador presents his compliments to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honour to transmit herewith enclosed a copy of a letter he has received from the Embassy at Berlin, dated the 29th ultimo, enclosing reports made by Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Rivington Pyne of visits made to the camps for officer prisoners of war at Mayence, Heidelberg, Villingen, and Ingolstadt, and to the camps for non-commissioned officers and men at Stuttgart, Ulm, Ingolstadt, Nürnberg, and Würzburg.

American Embassy, London, July 6, 1915.

Enclosure 1 in No. 7.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, June 29, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to forward to you, herewith enclosed, for transmission to His Majesty's Government, reports made by Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Rivington Pyne of visits made to the camps for officer prisoners of war at Mayence, Heidelberg, Villingen, and Ingolstadt, and to the camps for non-commissioned officers and men at Stuttgart, Ulm, Ingolstadt, Nürnberg, and Würzburg.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 7.

Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Pyne to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, June 28, 1915.

WE have the honour to report on the following prisoner-of-war camps for enlisted men, recently visited by us: Stuttgart, Ulm, Puchheim, Ingolstadt, Nürnberg, and Würzburg.

The general plan and organisation of all of these camps are alike, and similar to ones previously reported upon, so a detailed description of them will not be made.

Stuttgart.—Two camps have been established in the city. The prisoners in each were housed in abandoned factory buildings, in only one of which were English soldiers interned: Lance-Corporal Ramsbottom, 20th Hussars; Sergeant T. Roxby, 20th Regiment; and Private Vickery, 12th Lancers.

The buildings comprising this prison camp were of brick, of rather modern construction. The outbuildings had in a great measure been torn down, affording a large yard for exercise and recreation. The prisoners were housed in large rooms, which were well lighted and ventilated, and no overcrowding was observed. The ground floor of the main building—a huge hall-like room—was used as a mess room, long tables and benches being provided for messing arrangements. Opening off this space was a large wash room for clothing, and adjoining this was a room supplied with about twenty-four showers—hot and cold water—with a neighbouring dressing room. Bathing was compulsory, and the use of these showers was permitted at all hours of the day.

The kitchen was in a separate building in the courtyard, a German non-commissioned officer in charge, with cooks and assistants from among the French prisoners. A small canteen was provided, and at the extreme end of the yard, as well as in a room of the main building, was various athletic apparatus. The latrines were of the ordinary sink type.

The non-commissioned officers were quartered in a separate part of the building in a large room. A tailor and shoe shop was part of the equipment, as well as a barber shop, prisoners being employed in all of these departments.

Ulm.—This camp is placed on the outskirts of the town and is of the usual barrack type. Only one Englishman was found here, Private Jos. Powell, Northumberland Fusiliers. This man, after his capture, developed typhoid fever, and when convalescent had been sent to the hospital in Ulm with German wounded and sick. He had entirely recovered from his attack of typhoid, but on physical examination he was found to be suffering with a right inguinal hernia. The attention of the commandant was called to his condition, and the man was advised to undergo an operation. A visit was made to the "Garrison Lazarette," where there are several French wounded and sick under treatment. This garrison hospital was attractively situated on a hill overlooking the town, with a spacious garden. The buildings were of brick, with clean, spacious wards, well lighted and ventilated. Sisters and hospital orderlies were in attendance. The treatment, diet, &c., accorded these prisoners were the same as those given the German wounded and sick.

Puchheim.—This is a large camp, built to accommodate 12,000 prisoners. It is situated about 20 kilom. to the north of Munich in the small village of Puchheim. The compound in which the camp is placed has been used for some years past as a flying field. A stucco wall surrounded the whole enclosure. Wooden barracks housed the prisoners. There was in process of erection a large wooden building to be used for bathing and washing of clothes. A separate enclosure with wooden barracks was placed in one corner of the compound for hospital purposes. A German "Chef-Arzt" was in charge, assisted by French military surgeons; the attendants from the German hospital corps assisted by prisoners [sic].

Four Englishmen were here interned: Elias Round, Private Staffordshire Regiment; Geo. Harvey Kelly, Corporal King's Royal Rifle Corps; Wm. Stocks, Private 3rd South Staffordshire Regiment; and Fred Tudor, Private Gloucestershire Regiment.

The camp was equipped with a very good tailor shop, which turned out comfortable, serviceable uniforms, made of drill, for hot weather.

Ingolstadt.—The camp for the enlisted personnel in this city is placed on the edge of the town, and had also been a flying field. It is of the usual barrack type. Three English privates were found in the camp. In the town were two hospitals, in one of which were nine English. All of them were convalescent from their wounds, and were shortly to be transferred, either to the camp for enlisted men or to one of the many officers' camps in the neighbourhood, where they would serve as orderlies.

Nürnberg.—This large camp is somewhat different in its plan, the barracks forming the sides of a quadrangle instead of being placed in parallel rows, which is the usual arrangement. In the centre of the compound was a large barrack for the camp guard. On two sides of this were the two kitchens, and on the other two sides were two large latrines. Forty-eight English prisoners were found here. Near the prison compound, among the garrison buildings used for the artillery, was a hospital for the prisoners of war. These hospital facilities consisted of two large rooms, with an adjoining operating and dressing room, and below a kitchen. The sanitary arrangements were good. The wounded and sick prisoners were given good care and treatment. Nine wounded Englishmen were among the patients.

Würzburg.—This camp, of the usual barrack type, is placed outside of the town on the summit of a high hill; twenty-one English were among the prisoners. The latrines, sink type, were not altogether satisfactory, and the attention of the commandant was called to this fact.

In the city itself, in the Schiller Schule, which had been requisitioned for hospital purposes, were found three English wounded. They were quartered in rooms with French prisoners, were allowed the liberty of the courtyard, and were given excellent treatment and care.

In the camps visited, all of the English prisoners were seen. They were questioned regarding their treatment, and asked if they had any complaints to make. We were permitted to talk with them without the hearing of the German officers. There is no discrimination made in any way against them.

The food is in accordance with the recent regulations established by the Prussian War Ministry. The men get the bread given to the German soldiers, which they are not accustomed to and do not like. Under the existing conditions, this cannot be improved upon.

They are all badly in need of uniforms, some of them being dressed in French uniforms or the clothing supplied by the Germans. Some few of them are deserving of money. A list of those who require uniforms and need money will be made out and given to the British Department.

In the majority of these camps, many of the prisoners are detailed for work in the surrounding country. The work, as a rule, is optional, and few English volunteer or are commandeered for this purpose.

We have, &c.

KARL OHNESORG.
RIVINGTON PYNE.

Enclosure 3 in No. 7.

Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Pyne to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, June 26, 1915.

WE have the honour to report the following observations recently made in visiting the following camps for officer prisoners of war:—

Mainz.—This camp is in the citadel in the city. The details have previously been reported upon. Since the previous visit there has been a change in the personnel of the English officers; the present ones, sixty-three in number, were formerly confined in Burg. The senior in rank, Colonel Jackson, spoke well of the treatment, food, &c. There is one officer of the Royal Army Medical Corps, Lieut.-Colonel Thompson, confined there.

Heidelberg.—The officers, 280 in number, 15 of whom were British, including 1 Canadian and 1 Indian officer, were confined in a modernly constructed barracks, which had not been previously occupied by the Germans. The structure is of brick covered with stucco. The rooms were spacious, well lighted and ventilated, and were not overcrowded, the larger rooms furnished for nine officers. Among the Russian and French were several higher officers, who had rooms by themselves. Commander Barrow, R.N., was quartered alone. The sanitary arrangements were good. Each officer had an iron bedstead with a straw mattress, the higher officers being given hair mattresses. A wardrobe was also supplied each officer.

In an adjoining building were the kitchens and a large room where the officers messed together. Each officer paid 48 M. per month for his food. The evening meal was seen, and appeared to be of good quality. At the further end of this same building, entirely separated, with an entrance from the outside, were the shower baths, with hot and cold water. Comfortable reclining and steamer chairs were furnished for the officers' use out of doors. Two tennis courts were provided. A canteen, where the usual articles could be purchased at current prices, as well as light wines and beer, was established in the building used for messing. The whole enclosure was surrounded by a high barbed-wire fencing, the guard being stationed without this fence. Religious services are regularly held, and a room had been rigged up as a chapel. Sixty enlisted men from among the French and Russian prisoners served as orderlies for the officers. Surgeon King Brown, R.N.V.R., was among the English. The Indian officer—a Mahommedan—was given special food in accordance with his religion. A library, with Russian, French, and English books, was part of the equipment.

Villingen.—For the purposes of an officers' camp the barracks of the town was used. The buildings, of stone, were placed about the four sides of a quadrangle. The rooms were of different sizes, the largest quartering about twenty officers. Officers of higher rank, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, were given separate rooms or rooms with one or two companions. The higher officers messed together in a special dining room, while the remainder had their mess in a large hall, which also served as a reading and common room. It was supplied with a piano and small library. The sanitary arrangements were satisfactory, shower baths with hot and cold water supplied. Only two English officers, Lieutenant Fritz Roy and Lieutenant Greenslade, were found here. They both desired and asked not to be removed to another camp. The commandant, Major von Schoenebeck, had recently inaugurated a daily excursion for the imprisoned officers. In bodies of fifteen or twenty they were permitted to walk around the surrounding country under the charge of a non-commissioned officer with three or four of the guards, while those who sketched or painted were permitted to go out alone or in smaller groups with a single guard. The two English officers had been offered the privilege of sharing a room with two French officers, but they preferred to remain as originally placed.

Ingoldstadt.—Surrounding this city are a number of fortifications, built originally about 1875, which are now used as prison camps for officers. Two English officers, Squadron-Commander Briggs, R.N., Lieutenant Allsop, of the London Scottish, the former in festung No. 8 and the latter in festung No. 9, were interned here. The quarters were in the casemates of the forts, those of festung 9 communicating with one another. Large windows gave good light and ventilation. Sanitary conditions were not of the best; the latrines were placed in two of the casemates away from the quarters, and were of the ordinary sink type, absolutely open, and giving no privacy. The attention of the commandant was called to this, and he was asked to remedy it, if possible. He was also requested to confine the two English officers in the same fortress.

In the two courtyards of each fort tennis courts had been rigged. Each fort was surrounded by a moat filled with water, on the further side of which was placed a high barbed-wire fence.

The kitchens were in a casemate opening off of the court, and removed from the living quarters. There was no separate mess room, the officers messing in their living rooms. Shower baths, with hot and cold water, the use of which was permitted at all times, had been installed. The usual canteen facilities were given, the officers being able to purchase articles not kept in stock from the stores of the city.

In the city, in one of the lazarettes, Lieutenant Ratcliffe, of the West Yorkshire Regiment, was under treatment for a wound of the right arm, involving the ulnar nerve. He had been operated on, and spoke well of his treatment and care.

In all of these officers' camps the usual rules as regards correspondence were enforced. The officers received their mail and packages regularly. Medical care was given them. Lieutenants receive 60 M. a month in pay, captains and officers of higher rank 100 M. The average cost per month of mess was about 45 M. The food was of good quality and sufficiently varied, but German cooking is not popular among the French and English.

Appended hereto is a list of the British officers at Heidelberg.

We have, &c.

Enclosure in No. 9.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, July 5, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, in which was enclosed a copy of a note from the British Foreign Office stating that the conditions at the Würzburg camp are very unsatisfactory.

I enquired at the Prussian Ministry this afternoon and found that the matter in question had been taken up with the Bavarian military authorities, and that one of the officers, who expects to be in Munich next week, will follow it up. Consequently, I prefer to wait and see what can be done to improve matters before sending any report on this camp.

In regard to the lazaret in the Schiller Schule, in Würzburg, Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Pyne reported as follows:—

“In the lazaret in Schiller Schule were found one officer, Captain Rex T. Miller, Manchester Regiment, and three enlisted men of the English Army: Charles Beare, private, 1st Lincolnshire Regiment; Michael Claffey, private, Royal Irish Regiment; and Edwin Firth, private, 1st Lancashire Regiment.

“This school made a very good hospital. The privates were quartered with other French enlisted prisoners; the officer was quartered with five French officers in a large room, and these officers had a French orderly detailed to wait upon them. They all spoke of the courteous treatment and good professional care which they were receiving in the hospital. There was no sentry or guard stationed without their quarters, and they were permitted free access to the spacious court-yard.

“In the Citadelle, at Würzburg are: Lieutenant C. G. S. Irvine, King's Own; Lieutenant E. W. S. Foljambe, Rifle Brigade; Captain R. A. Reddie, 3rd Norfolk Regiment; and G. Parke, an engineer in the Mercantile Marine. Lieutenant Irvine and Mr. Parke were both in Germany at the outbreak of the war and were arrested and have been confined in this fortress since August last.”

I have, &c.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, July 3, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith, for communication to the British Government, copies of memorandum reports made to me by Mr. Jackson of visits to the prisoners of war camps at Stendal, Zerbst, and Wittenberg, and to be, Sir, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 10.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Stendal.

ON sandy soil, in what were cavalry exercise grounds, a camp has been built to contain 15,000 prisoners of war. Dependent upon this camp are a large number of "Arbeitslager" containing men in groups of various numbers from ten or a dozen up to 2,000, and at the time of my visit there were only about 7,200 in the parent camp. In that number were included sixty-four British and Canadians, all of whom had been more or less severely wounded, who had been brought during the past few weeks from hospitals at Cologne and Wittenberg. All said that they had been well treated in the hospitals, and several mentioned the fact that they had been treated with great kindness in the temporary hospitals to which they had been brought immediately after their capture. Four British prisoners from this camp were included in the recent exchange of severely wounded, but there remain a number who have lost a limb or are on crutches, and who could be of no further active military service. None of these British prisoners are called on to work outside and only a few do light jobs in the camp. One of the non-commissioned officers (Corporal Frazer) has recovered from his wounds to such an extent that he is to take part in a boxing match with the French camp champion in a few days. I talked with all the British prisoners and none had any important complaint. A few thought that their letters were not coming through promptly, but on investigation I found that their mail (letters and parcels) was still being sent by their friends to the hospitals in which they had been before coming to Stendal. They all said that their mail had been received promptly while they were in the hospitals. A few wanted boots or underclothing, but they admitted that they had not made their wants known to the German authorities, and as soon as I called attention to the matter the commandant said they would be supplied. There is a large tailor shop (Russian prisoners) in the camp where quantities of outer garments (dark blue for summer, and dark blue or black for winter, with yellow piping) are being made to replace worn-out uniforms. In my conversation with the prisoners there was no complaint about the food, and not one of them even mentioned that subject. The kitchens are large, well arranged and scrupulously clean. The menu for the week is appended hereto.* The canteen seemed well supplied, and "lemonades" and alcohol-free beer are purchasable. There were no British patients in the lazaret, where one British private helps keep the place in order. The building was clean and well ventilated. In the lazaret all the sick have beds, and in the ordinary barracks iron beds are also provided for such of the severely wounded as might find it difficult to use the ordinary mattresses which are used by the other prisoners as well as by the German guards. The barracks are of the ordinary wooden type, clean, well aired and not over-crowded. The camp is divided into eight company enclosures each of which has its own wash and clothes drying rooms (there are also open-air washing facilities), and latrines, which are far enough from the barracks to be unobjectionable and connected with the city water system so that they can be flushed as often as is desirable. There is one bath room (about forty douches with hot and cold water) with disinfecting ovens, through which the men and their clothes pass about once a week. An open-air swimming bath is being arranged. Tub baths are provided in the lazaret where there is also a croquet ground.

The commandant, Colonel Krause, has had charge of the camp ever since it was opened last October, and he seems very much interested in his work and is evidently respected by the prisoners. He has made use of large plots of ground in the neighbourhood of the camp to grow potatoes, cabbages, lettuce, &c., the profits being used for the benefit of the prisoners as a body.

Enclosure 3 in No. 10.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Zerbst.

THE camp at Zerbst is built on what was formerly the infantry drill ground. When full it would contain about 15,000 prisoners. It is built on the usual plan, and divided into two battalions of eight companies each. The kitchens (well arranged) and disinfecting plant are outside the company enclosures, each of which contains its own canteen, baths, and wash room (hot and cold water) and latrines. The prisoners and their clothes are disinfected every ten days or so (causing their clothes to deteriorate rapidly), and the English soldiers told me that they could bathe as often as they liked. The latrines are on the trench system, built with an intention to have them flushed, but it was found impracticable to do this on account of the flatness of the neighbouring country, so dry "moss" is now used, and the trenches are cleaned out by hand. In the company enclosures there are tailor, shoemaker, and carpenter shops, and several (French) artists have the use of small rooms as studios. Throughout the camp there are taps for drinking water.

On the camp's books there are now between 12,000 and 13,000 prisoners, many of whom, including a few Englishmen, have been sent off on working parties, in the mines and elsewhere. In the camp there remain about seventy British prisoners at present, who are distributed among the different companies. Those in the same company are permitted to live together in one part of the barracks. The barracks are whitewashed on the outside and the air in them seemed good. With the exception of one of those which I saw, they did not appear over-crowded, and the commandant explained the condition of this one by saying that he had had to make room for a number of newly arrived Russians, who had already been quarantined and disinfected, but who, he thought, should still be kept apart from the other prisoners for the present. Senior non-commissioned officers share small rooms with French and Russians of similar rank, having beds. As there are few British non-commissioned officers of higher rank, and as there are very few German guards in the camp itself, much of the camp discipline is in the hands of the French and Russians, which does not give satisfaction to the British prisoners.

Several cases of punishment for breaches of discipline had occurred, and one British soldier told me that he had been tied to a stake—last December. The commandant explained that this was the regulation punishment for the prisoners and for German offenders as well, in places where there are no cells, and that two hours at the stake (all that is given on any one day) is considered as equivalent to twenty-four hours' solitary confinement. French non-commissioned officers control the quantity of food prepared, which appears to give satisfaction to all but the English prisoners who, as usual, do not find it to their taste. They seemed to be in good condition, but they claimed that this was due to the receipt of large packages from home. Mail and parcels come through in a generally satisfactory manner, but there were, as usual, some complaints that parcels had not arrived, or that they came in bad condition. The German officials called attention to the fact that, while there had been considerable improvement, a large number of parcels from England are still insecurely packed.

The camp was opened in November, and it was in quarantine during a part of the winter, but the epidemic had been comparatively light and the camp was declared free from typhus fever several weeks ago. Major Long and a number of men belonging to the R.A.M.C. had left for England a few days ago. In the lazaret there were three British soldiers who said that their treatment was good. There was also one civilian, by the name of Nykiel (tuberculous), who claims that he is an Australian, but is under suspicion of being a Polish spy, and consequently has not been sent to Ruhleben. In each company enclosure a part of one of the barracks is partitioned off so as to provide a room in which the cooks (who must be up earlier than the other prisoners) may sleep by day. The cooks and those who do extra (special) work, have beds while the other prisoners sleep on the usual straw mattresses. Rooms with beds are also provided for the severely wounded who do not need treatment, and these same rooms are also used by men suffering with slight ailments whom it is not thought necessary to send to the lazaret. Men in the lazaret are given special diet, and in the lazaret enclosure there is a tennis court. A number of British soldiers were ready to make complaints in regard to treatment at the time of their capture or soon thereafter, but most of them said that conditions had improved and none were willing to say that their treatment had been different from that of other prisoners or that the Germans had discriminated against them, although I talked with them freely and out of hearing of the officials. Clothing has been furnished to those who needed it and who made their wants known.

July 2, 1915.

Enclosure 4 in No. 10.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Wittenberg.

AT Wittenberg I was told that there were no longer any prisoners of war (officers or men) in any of the local lazarets, although a number had been there earlier in the war. It is said that most of the lazarets are comparatively empty at the present moment.

The prisoner of war camp is just beyond the city at Klein Wittenberg, but as it is still in quarantine on account of typhus fever, I was unable to go inside. I was able to look over the camp, however, and to see many prisoners at a distance. It appeared to be clean and in good order, and the men looked in good condition. The camp contains at present about 13,000 prisoners, of whom more than two-thirds are Russian, and has been in quarantine since early in the winter. Among the prisoners are about 800 British soldiers and thirty-nine British civilians, who are to be transferred to Ruhleben as soon as it can be done without risk—probably in a few weeks, as there are only a small number of cases of typhus remaining and as the general health of the camp is said to be otherwise good. The prisoners are allowed to receive their mail and parcels, and for several weeks they have been permitted to write letters, which are forwarded after being disinfected. The commandant said that complaints had not been made to him about food, and he told me that he had recently had a military band play (just outside the camp) for the benefit of the prisoners, which had seemed to give them much pleasure.

Most of the medical work inside the camp is done by captured medical officers, principally French and Russian, but among the number are Captain Priestley and Captain Surgeons Vidal and James La Fayette (?), of the R.A.M.C., of whom the last two are to be sent back to England when the quarantine is raised. Major [sic] Priestley will be detained until certain proceedings against him are closed. A considerable number of Indian prisoners had been sent to Zossen (see report dated the 8th April) in January, shortly before the epidemic broke out.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 6th instant,* transmitting copy of a despatch from the United States Ambassador at Berlin, enclosing reports made by Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Rivington Pyne, on visits to various camps in which British prisoners are interned, has the honour to request that an expression of his thanks for these interesting reports may be conveyed to these gentlemen.

Sir E. Grey notes that the sanitary arrangements at the officers' camp at Ingolstadt, and at the camp for non-commissioned officers and men at Würzburg are not satisfactory, but feels no doubt that the steps taken by Mr. Gerard in this matter will, as in so many other cases, lead to a speedy improvement in the state of affairs described.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith, for the information of the British Government, a copy of a letter dated the 5th instant from Mr. H. H. I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 12.

American Consul-General at Hamburg to Mr. Gerard.

Hamburg, July 5, 1915.

IT is only to-day that I have been able to visit the different lazarets in Hamburg which have British wounded prisoners.

The lazarets in question are: the one situated on the Ericastrasse, the one at Fuhlsbüttel, and the marine lazaret at the Veedel.

At the first named I found ten wounded prisoners, at the second also ten, and at the third there were three. For your guidance I am sending you herewith a table showing the names of the different prisoners and the different lazarets, together with their home address and the regiment to which each belonged.

It is not necessary for me to enter into the details of the different lazarets which I visited, beyond stating that they are all in the most up-to-date condition, and everything is being done for the wounded that could be done anywhere.

I was accompanied on my rounds by an officer who spoke English, but I was convinced, from the hearty response which I received from all the wounded in reference to their treatment at the different lazarets, that every possible care is being given to them. They are only in need of tobacco, pipes, and cigarettes, and English literature, all of which I have promised to send them. If you think that I would be authorised in expending from time to time say 500 M. or 600 M. for the purchase of tobacco for these prisoners and charge the same up to the British Government, I would be very glad if you would let me know. I have a fund here, however, from which I can supply them with these articles, provided the British Government will not do so.

A number of the wounded have not been able to get into communication with their families in England, or they have written without having received any replies, and I am writing a personal letter to all their different families to-day. I believe that most of the wounded whom I saw have not been very severely wounded, and at least 90 per cent. of them were already up and about.

Very sincerely yours,

H. H. MORGAN.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, July 8, 1915.

WITH reference to my letter to you of the 11th January, in reply to yours of the 29th December, 1914, in which was enclosed a copy of a note from the British Foreign Office, dated the 26th December, relative to the treatment of prisoners of war in Germany, particularly as reported by Major C. B. Vandeleur of the 1st Cameronians, I have the honour to enclose herewith, for transmission to the British Government, a copy of a note from the Imperial Foreign Office, dated the 30th ultimo, with enclosures containing reports made by the German military authorities of the investigation of the incidents in question.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Note verbale.

(Translation.)

THE Foreign Office, replying to the note verbale of the Embassy of the United States of America, dated the 11th January, regarding complaints formulated by the British Government of alleged bad treatment of British prisoners of war in Germany, has the honour to state that these complaints have been made the object of a thorough investigation by the German military authorities. The result is set forth in the annexed statement and enclosures, which may be communicated according to discretion to the British Government.

Berlin, June 30, 1915.

Enclosure 3 in No. 13.

(Translation.)

Statement by the German Military Authorities in answer to the Complaints about the Bad Treatment of Prisoners of War, transmitted by the Embassy of the United States of America in their Note verbale of January 11, 1915.

(I.)

THOROUGH investigations into the complaints by Major Vandeleur, an escaped British prisoner of war, have established the following facts:—

(A.)—Capture and Journey to Germany.

On account of the great number of prisoners and of the period (six months) which has elapsed since the events under discussion, it has not been possible to go into the facts one by one. This much, however, is certain, that the statements are pretty untrue and partly immeasurably exaggerated. Major Vandeleur appears to take not the slightest account of the peculiar conditions imposed by war.

The following remarks apply to specific allegations:—

1. Douai being a very advanced halting place and full of German troops, accommodation even for German soldiers offered great difficulties. It is obvious that prisoners of war cannot expect better accommodation than the enemy's own troops.

2. That the prisoners received no attention must be considered out of the question. Equally so that representatives of the French Red Cross were obstructed in distributing food and drink. On the other hand, ladies of the French Red Cross were found offering alcohol to the prisoners, which of course is prohibited. In the field hospitals, as, for instance, at Mons (Bergen), prisoners of war were treated on the same footing as our own troops.

3. As regards Major Vandeleur's declaration that our German officers spat at him and another took away his overcoat by force, the German military authorities hold such occurrences to be simply beyond the bound of possibility, having regard to the mentality, up-bringing, and social status of the whole class of German officers.

4. The same applies to the statement that prisoners' overcoats were taken away from them.

5. No official information has been received of prisoners of war at Douai being sworn at by German soldiers. In order to obviate henceforth the possibility of such occurrences, unauthorised persons are kept at a distance from prisoners' camps, and sentries are set from time to time with this object in view. There certainly did exist a strong and justifiable feeling of bitterness against the English, as wounded German soldiers returning from the front brought back large numbers of English bullets with a "dum-dum" action, and brutal weapons (two-edged dirks, "Doppeldolche").

6. As regards Major Vandeleur's statement that he was put into a cattle-truck, together with private soldiers, mention must be made of the following:—

In those days there was brought to Douai as a prisoner of war an English officer who, perhaps wrongly, was set down as a "colonel"; like the other English officers, however, he had no sign of rank on his uniform.

When interrogated by German officers, he declared that he would speak with no German officer—at most, he would spit at one. He remarked to another German officer at the station at Mons that he would respect no German officers except those of the Horse Guards. This ill-bred behaviour was rightly requited by making the offender travel in a cattle-truck. There is much to be said for the belief that the officer in question was Major Vandeleur, particularly so as this was the only disagreeable incident with an officer prisoner of war which occurred in the course of months.

7. In view of the cleanliness which prevails without exception in German railway carriages, it is out of the question that the floor of the carriage can have been "covered 3 inches deep with fresh dung"; it must be that the prisoners themselves at once defiled the carriage by relieving themselves. All the carriages have ventilators, moreover.

That on occasion fifty-two instead of forty-eight men were put into one carriage is possible, given the deficiency of carriages that existed at the time. It must be noted also that the Englishmen's allies—the French—put German army doctors, who had fallen into their hands, by preference into cattle-trucks. Apart from this, the prisoners, on many occasions, as, for instance, in talking to the station commandant at Mons, spoke in grateful terms of their good treatment.

8. If the English pretend that they were attended to during the journey only after the French, the reason is to be found in the quite comprehensible bitterness of feeling among the German troops, who respected the French on the whole as honourable and decent opponents, whereas the English mercenaries had, in their eyes, adopted a cunning method of warfare from the very beginning, and, when taken prisoners, bore themselves with an insolent and provocative mien. That any such distinction of treatment was ordered by superior officers is an untruth.

(B.)—Life in the Internment Camp.

Major Vandeleur admits himself that there was "not so much to complain of" in this matter. The following details deserve remark:—

9. In the early days there was only one orderly to serve every fifteen officer prisoners; later, while Major Vandeleur was still there, the number of rank and file was so greatly increased that every five officers had one orderly. Even in the early days the officers were not obliged to make their own beds and clean their own boots.

10. German soldiers' beds must be good enough for prisoners of war. The size of the rooms occupied by seven officers is proportionate to the number of occupants.

11. The sale of beer and light wines has since been sanctioned in officers' camps.

12. As regards officers' pay, the negotiations now in course should be referred to. That sums of money of a considerable amount are not left in the officers' possession, but are kept for them, a receipt given, and the money paid out as required, needs no explanation. As for the price of board, Major Vandeleur was himself one of the spokesmen on the occasion when the price was settled by general consent. He seems, moreover, to hold the view that any dishes not known in England or not prepared in the English way are bad.

13. The reason given by the English officers for not desiring any more visits from the Evangelical minister of religion was not "his disagreeable remarks about the late King," but his indistinct pronunciation.

14. The English soldiers did not have their overcoats and tunics "taken away from them"; they may, perhaps, have sold them, or lost them at play in many instances to more pecunious Frenchmen or Belgians. As they had to be clothed, French and Belgian uniforms were given them when English uniforms ran out, and they were similarly provided with missing underwear. Sabots were issued as substitutes for boots. The German military authorities cannot be expected to provide new boots straight away for prisoners of war numbering now over a million. Officers had to hand over their civilian belongings, but only after they had been replaced by items of uniform. This regulation is thoroughly sound.

15. For the rest, Germany lives well up to her obligations under article 7 of The Hague Convention. The idea of supplying articles of clothing to the generality of prisoners of war cannot, therefore, be entertained. There is no lack of clothing or coverings.

It is certainly possible that British prisoners still possess the clothes which they wore at the time of their capture. The prisoners naturally wear their clothes as long as they are wearable.

The bedding-straw in the men's camps is regularly changed.

16. It is, with a few exceptions, untrue that English orderlies were afflicted with lice. Only three of them have suffered from scabies. The truth is, however, that the English private soldiers, like the Russians, but in distinction from the French and Belgians, always arrive in the internment camps filthy and lousy in the highest degree and have to be freed from vermin with the greatest trouble.

17. The English rank and file are sufficiently fed. None of them have been in a "half-starved condition." They have, moreover, declared unanimously that no difference has been made between their own treatment and that of the French and Belgians.

18. If it is a fact that English soldiers were especially employed on disagreeable work, the cause thereof is explained by the following facts: Prisoners of war are put to particular work in accordance with their particular training and ability. Most French and Russian soldiers have learnt a handicraft or something of the sort, belonging, as they do—as the result of universal military service—to some or other civilian trade, and can, therefore, be employed accordingly; in their work, they are mostly handy, willing, and industrious. The soldiers of the English standing paid army, on the contrary, have usually learnt nothing, and are fit for no particular employ outside the care of horses and farm work; they are besides frequently lazy, arrogant, and obstinate. Even those of them who know a little German pretend not to.

According to the "Daily Mail" of the 17th April, 1915, an English prisoner of war stated to an American engaged in making a report: "We absolutely refuse to speak their language, although we know a little of it." It is not to be wondered at, in these circumstances, if the common jobs requiring no particular skill fall in many cases to the English.

19. Arrangements for the correspondence of prisoners of war are regulated uniformly in all camps.

20. Nothing is known in Crefeld of officers and men having been killed after capture and of proofs thereof having been collected there. The question refers perhaps to individuals who have been found by German soldiers in the act of killing helpless German wounded and have met with their just reward.

21. Major Vandeleur liked to grumble, but he never made complaint of his treatment or housing in the camp at Crefeld. It is significant that his own comrades considered him not quite normal. The same opinion about him was expressed in a letter from the wife of an English colonel in the internment camp at Crefeld written to her husband, based, moreover, on what Major Vandeleur had been relating in England about his experiences as a prisoner.

22. Two neutrals, the Swiss deputy Eugster and the Spanish consul Palmaroli, inspected the camp of Crefeld on the 2nd March, 1915, and passed very favourable judgment on the arrangements; this, too, after conversing free from observation with officers and men.

23. Letters from Major Vandeleur's relations are in our possession which show that he himself, while a prisoner, sent favourable reports about his state of treatment. Further, on the 6th March, 1915, Lieutenant-Colonel Bolton of the Scots Guards and Lieutenant-Colonel Gibbs of the Duke of Wellington's Regiment, expressly declared to the camp-commandant at Crefeld that all the English officers there were satisfied with their treatment and that no distinction was made between them and the French. Many voluntary statements exist to prove that in German hospitals no difference is made between friend and foe. Copy of a letter of this sort from an English prisoner of war, B. Thompson, who was treated in the reserve hospital at Bensheim is herewith enclosed.

II.—Remarks on the General Complaints of the British Government.

24. British officer prisoners of war seem to find it disagreeable to be put together with Russian officers. The German Government see no reason whatever why any separation should be made among captured enemy officers in their quarters. Since England does not blush to use coloured troops of all races against Germany in the present war, English officers must not be surprised if they are brought into close contact in prison with their comrades in arms of other nationalities.

As regards the specific complaint about the officers' internment camp at Stralsund, reference is made to the annexed report by the commandant of that camp.

25. The only officers in Sennelager are a few army medical officers. These are allowed to write and receive letters in the same way as elsewhere.

26. Direct communication between Major Vandeleur and the Ambassador of the United States, America, in Berlin, was forbidden with perfect right. The register of British officers at Crefeld asked for by the Embassy was sent to them by the Acting General Commanding the VIIth Army Corps on the 8th December last.

27. The imputation that on Germany's side prisoners of war were the objects of inhuman conduct, and that the provisions of international law concerning their treatment were utterly ignored, must be repudiated. Reports and descriptions of the condition of enemy prisoners of war in Germany by the American Ambassador, the Swiss deputy Eugster, and other trustworthy persons state the contrary. That English prisoners were not "singled out for bad treatment" is proved in the first instance by the fact that they are everywhere housed together with their Allies of different nationalities and races.

28. Details about the camp at Minden appeared in the "Morning Post" of the 15th December, 1914, and the necessary work of verification on the part of the German authorities was accomplished in January.

No "French clergyman" was ever released from this camp, and such a person cannot, therefore, have given information.

Finally, attention is drawn, in connection with this point, to the report annexed to the German note verbale to the Embassy of the 23rd February.

III.

29. With reference to the description by a "Citizen of the U.S.A." of Döberitz, it is to be noticed that the visit which must be the one in question was undertaken at the most unfavourable time conceivable, seeing that at that period the prisoners were still living in tents, many of which were blown down or damaged by the autumnal storms. On account of this circumstance and the wetness of the season the camp apparently gave the visitor the impression of being particularly unlivable in.

Even if the report does not contain an actually untruthful description of what he saw, he at any rate judges everything without making the slightest intelligent allowance for the peculiar conditions of war. It will suffice in this respect simply to point to the obviously far worse conditions which prevailed during the autumn of that year in the internment camp for German civilian prisoners at Newbury, in England. The following particular points must be noticed with regard to the above-mentioned American description:—

30. It is untrue that the 9,000 prisoners were "very miserable (or sickly) men." Except for a few dozen sick or wounded they were all strong and healthy.

31. The stable tents are better and warmer than others. Whether or not the patched parts were of "colours that clashed" is entirely beside the point. Many German prisoners in the enemy's countries have been lodged in tents even in the depth of winter, and still are so to some extent, although none of the enemy countries has to provide for a number of prisoners even approximately equal to those in Germany. In fact, very considerable sums are expended on the maintenance of prisoners in Germany.

32. Although the English prisoners found their lives intolerably monotonous, as the report states, yet here, as in other camps, they tried to escape from even the lightest task.

33. The general observations of the author of the report concerning the war give proof of an utter lack of comprehension of military necessities.

34. The prisoners of war had daily opportunity for washing the whole body most thoroughly.

35. As regards the prevalence of lice among the English, see above, No. 16.

36. A certain number of fights have taken place between the English and other prisoners. Besides this, the various nationalities avoid each other carefully. If the Allies find each other unattractive when they are brought into closer contact, it is no fault of the Germans.

37. The author of the report, having "hastily examined the prisoners' soup," found it "a dreadfully unappetising sort of food." Here again it is apparent how an arbitrary judgment was pronounced on the strength of a very superficial inspection. German officers, who often sample the food, find it good. It may well happen that the English do not find new dishes so palatable as the extravagant fare which England provides for her mercenaries. Groats, which English soldiers are reported to have spoken of as too bad to give to pigs, are readily eaten by many Germans, and are even a favourite dish in certain parts of England.

38. The tents which incurred such unfavourable judgment from the American visitor were thoroughly inspected at about the same time by another neutral observer, Sven Hedin, whose verdict was one of approbation in every respect. The present camp of huts was likewise inspected not long ago by two Rumanian visitors. Another favourable report of this camp is contained in the Madrid newspaper "Tribuna" (No. 1151 of the 23rd March last), under the heading "En el Campamento de Döberitz."

Sir,

Bensheim, February 23, 1915.

I, Bernard Thompson, declare that since I have been under treatment by the Germans I have been treated in the most civil manner. I have had my wounds properly attended to at all times, and I have also always had plenty of something to eat; in fact, I could not have been better treated by my own people. I was under German doctors in France, where I was treated as well as anyone could be, no matter what nationality they were. On leaving Cambrai I was properly attended to before I left, and visited occasionally by the doctor before arriving at Bensheim. I got food and coffee at certain stations on the journey, and it was always served in a most civil manner. I have not been treated like a prisoner at all, but as one of your own people; and I think any English prisoner who grumbles at the treatment I have seen them get ought to be ashamed of himself; as for myself, I have never heard anyone complain yet. If anyone has been insulted or ill-treated in any way, I think it must have been their own fault.

All the prisoners I have been with, both French and English, have always been very well satisfied in the way they have been treated.

You may use this letter in any way you think fit.

I wish to state that everything written in this letter is the absolute truth and nothing exaggerated, so I will conclude, and remain

Your obedient Servant,

B. THOMPSON, English Prisoner of War.

Internment Camp for Officers.

To the Ministry for War, Berlin.

Of the newspaper articles received here, the first of those written by Dr. Swaginzew, of Petersburg, and another published by a doctor in the "Rjetsch," deal with conditions in the officers' internment camp on the Island Danholm, near Stralsund.

Dr. Swaginzew, and probably also the author of the second article, were in the Danholm camp between the 12th November and the 3rd December, 1914. They had been sent to Stralsund from Soldau, together with other members of the medical corps, and received lodging and treatment in the camp on the same terms as the Russian officers who were prisoners there. As they refused to serve any longer as doctors among the Russian prisoners, they were released and sent to Russia, via Sweden, on the 3rd December, 1914, by order of the acting general in command, dated the 25th November, 1914.

The conduct of these doctors was, from the start, provocative. They asserted that their internment in an officers' internment camp was illegal according to the Geneva Convention, and submitted unwillingly to the camp regulations. One of the doctors went the length of complaining, in a loud and unseemly fashion, to a sergeant on duty, saying that the doctors and officers were lodged in barrack-rooms ordinarily inhabited by German soldiers. After the unseemliness of his behaviour had been suitably brought to the attention of this doctor no further opposition was made to the camp regulations.

In Dr. Swaginzew's article the camp regulations at Danholm are likened to "prison routine." It is to be noted, with reference to this, that safety and the maintenance of order in the separate barracks scattered over the island makes it necessary to post sentinels, the more so as the island, besides being used for the internment of prisoners, serves also as an exercise ground for the local battalion of Ersatz troops and is lived on by military officials. All sentinels are supplied with precise instructions concerning their behaviour towards the interned officers, so that up to the present no troubles have arisen. The number of sentinels is restricted to the lowest possible figure.

It is a pure lie that German soldiers forced their way into the Russian officers' room with their caps on their heads and proceeded to whistle and shout, as the writer of the article asserts. The camp regulations prohibit everyone from entering the room, and the only persons who have a right to enter are the inspecting officials on duty. It is just as much of an invention that an interned officer was punished with imprisonment for refusing to obey a sergeant. No such punishment has yet been inflicted in the camp. When little acts of this kind take place—they generally arise in the course of quarrels between the Russian officers themselves—the officer involved is sent to other barracks with the consent of the senior interned officer (in each camp the officer of highest rank is appointed as senior officer).

As concerns the officers' clothing, which the writer of the article describes as pitiful, it is a matter which has nothing to do with the German officials of the camp, but concerns the interned officers themselves, who receive their pay for the purpose of providing themselves with clothes, and are allowed to enlarge their wardrobe as much as they like. Camp shoemakers and tailors, taken from among the Russians, are at the officers' disposal for this purpose.

The complaints about the food, made in this and the other article, have as little foundation and truth as the other accusations brought against the management of the camp. The commandant has a contract with the canteen-keeper, who is charged with the catering for the Russian officers, whereby they have to be provided for at 1.50 M. a head per diem. The price is deliberately fixed so low as this in order that officers of the rank of lieutenant may have enough of their war-pay left over to meet their other needs, such as washing. It is obvious enough that with the price so low as this, and under existing conditions, the food cannot be such as many of the officers are, perhaps, used to at home. It must be taken into account, too, that Russians are accustomed to a different sort of diet. The catering for the Russian officers is most carefully overseen by the camp commandant, and every reasonable grievance has been at once rectified.

It is stated in both articles that the British officers, of whom there were six at Danholm during the period between the 3rd November and the 15th December, 1914, were treated in manner inspired by quite peculiar hatred. If the guards did in fact show less sympathy for these than for the prisoners of other nationalities, it is quite intelligible considering that in the early days the English officers behaved in a very haughty and insubordinate fashion. It must, on the other hand, be put down as an untruth that the English experienced treatment such as is described in the two articles written by the doctors. The English were not put into separate rooms, nor were they forbidden to hold intercourse with each other, except in so far as the camp regulations prohibited it generally. The distribution of the English among the several barracks was regulated by a general order; for the rest, they were treated in the same way as the other interned officers. As regards the incident concerning the visit of one of the British officers, and the statement that one of these officers was even struck by the camp-officer, these matters will be returned to in the course of some observations about the second article.

The assertions of the writer about the retention of Russian letters is just as much a fiction as his statements that the treatment of the prisoners changed after the alleged Russian victories of that time.

The second article which is said to have appeared in the "Rjetsch," and whose author is unknown, but was beyond doubt one of the doctors released at that time, makes an attempt to view the condition of the interned Russian officers at Danholm from a more objective standpoint. But it too, like the first article, contains untrue and incorrect statements on many points.

First of all, all the conversations which the doctor pretends to have had with the officer on duty in the camp are absolutely invented. Such conversations never took place, as is proved by the fact that the camp-officer has no relative who has been dragged off to Siberia. Similarly, the stories of the dragoman who intercepted letters and of the volunteer from Heyking are devoid of truth.

The war-pay of the doctors and of the officers has always been paid out to them in the manner prescribed by the regulation concerning war-pay.

As regards the incident of the English officer who, as the writer himself admits, had been taken by the doctor, contrary to the regulations of the commandant, from barracks 2/3 to barracks 4, together with the sick man, and had not, as Dr. Swaginzew asserts, come there by chance, this occurrence certainly did take place, but not in the manner described by the doctor. The camp-officer was perfectly justified in lecturing in the severest terms both the doctor and the English officer for their breach of the camp rules. He did so in a manner quite in keeping with the circumstances. The term "deliberate falsehood" must be applied to the statement that the camp-officer went so far in his hatred of the Englishman as to strike an officer of the English Guard on the chest, as the author of the article declares. Such an event never occurred, nor anything in the least similar which could have been exaggerated into an incident of the sort.

As mentioned above, the English were treated strictly according to the rules, like the prisoners of other nationalities. None of the guards nor officers, nor the commandant, ever had the desire, as is stated, to vent their fury on defenceless prisoners.

The generals, colonels, and other officers who were interned here for a long time and are now at Heidelberg, Villingen, and Friedberg, departed from here with regret, and, before going, expressed their thanks to the acting commandant of the camp for their good treatment.

No. 14.

Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London, to Sir Edward Grey.—(Received July 18.)

THE American Ambassador presents his compliments to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honour to enclose herewith a copy of a report of a visit made by the Honourable J. B. Jackson to the officers' camp at Augustabad, near Neubrandenburg in Mecklenburg, together with three post-cards* showing the building in which the British officers are interned and its location.

Enclosure 1 in No. 14.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, July 10, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith, for communication to the British Government, a copy of a report of a visit made by Mr. Jackson to the officers' prisoner of war camp at Augustabad, near Neubrandenburg in Mecklenburg, on the 9th instant, with which are enclosed three post-cards showing the building in which the British officers are interned and its location.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 14.

Report by Mr. Jackson on his Visit to Detention Camp at Neubrandenburg.

ABOUT a month ago the "Kurhotel Augustabad" on the Tollense See, near Neubrandenburg in Mecklenburg, was taken over by the military authorities as a place of detention for officer prisoners of war, and a few days later about 190 officers (principally from Halle a/d Saale) were brought there. The establishment consists of one good-sized hotel and several villas. It is separated from the Tollense Lake by a road, and is surrounded by woods. The view is attractive in every direction, the air is good, and the place is healthy. Twenty-four British officers, all of whom came from Halle, were brought here originally, but two (Surgeon Greig and Lieutenant Gordon Barker) have been sent home in the meantime, and one, Lieutenant Hardy, who made an attempt to escape, is soon to be sent elsewhere. All these officers live in the hotel proper, Colonel Enderbey and Major Haig (compare report of visit to Halle on the 1st April, 1915) sharing a room on the lake side of the building, and all the other Englishmen being by themselves in rooms holding from two to seven persons each. None of the rooms are overcrowded as compared with other places of internment either in Germany or England, and all are well ventilated. The hotel is heated by steam so that it could be used in the winter. On each floor there are water-closets and a bath (tub with shower), as provided for the usual summer guests, who were of course fewer in number than the present occupants. On the ground floor of the hotel are three dining-rooms, one of which is used by all the English officers, who sit together. I took luncheon (the regular midday meal) with these gentlemen, having almost exactly the same menu (soup, meat balls, and potatoes, fruit, coffee, and beer) that I had when I lunched with the German officer prisoners of war at Holyport on the 29th January. The officers pay 50 M. a month for their food, the kitchen being in charge of the regular hotel staff. They are at liberty to order extras within reason at their own expense. The hotel and a good-sized garden are enclosed with a barbed wire and high board fence. In the garden there are trees and flower beds and a broad oval path of about 200 yards in length. There is also a horizontal bar for exercise. The officers are permitted to have steamer chairs. There are no guards within the enclosure, in which I spent about three hours in unrestricted intercourse with the interned, none of whom wished to make any complaint. Until a few days ago the officers were permitted to use a tennis court outside the enclosure, to swim in the lake, and to walk in the neighbouring woods. As four officers (one Englishman) made an attempt to escape (from the bath-house), these privileges were temporarily suspended, but I was told by the commandant, whose relations with the prisoners are of the best, that they would be restored at an early date.

As all the British prisoners are in touch with their friends at home, and have received letters and parcels since their transfer to Neubrandenburg, I did not consider it necessary to take a list. All were in good physical condition and in good spirits. One or two spoke of twinges of rheumatism, but others who have had tendencies to lung troubles are in better health than they were before.

In the camp are two or three British soldiers among the officers' servants, who are entirely satisfied with their present treatment.

No. 15.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 12th instant,* transmitting copies of reports by Mr. Jackson on visits to prisoners of war camps at Stendal, Zerbst, and Wittenberg, which have been read with much interest, has the honour to state that his attention has been particularly attracted by a statement made in the report on Stendal camp, that there are there a number of British prisoners who have lost a limb or are on crutches, and who could be of no further active military service. In the circumstances it would appear that some at least of these men are entitled to repatriation, and Sir E. Grey would be glad to learn whether the German authorities are considering such action with regard to them.

* See No. 10.

Sir E. Grey also notes that at Zerbst there is a British prisoner who had been punished by being tied to a stake in December last. The infliction of a punishment of this nature in an internment camp would be hard to justify even in cases where no punishment cells exist, and Sir E. Grey trusts that, as the organisation of the camps has now been completed, this method of punishment has been definitely abolished. Sir E. Grey also trusts that measures have been taken to do away with any justification for complaints by prisoners as to their treatment at the time of capture or soon thereafter, such as which a number of British soldiers at Zerbst were ready to make.

No. 16.

Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London, to Sir Edward Grey.—(Received July 25.)

THE American Ambassador presents his compliments to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honour to transmit herewith enclosed a copy of a letter he has received from the Embassy at Berlin, dated the 17th instant, enclosing a copy of a report made by Dr. Karl Ohnesorg of visits made by him to the officer camps at Friedburg and Hannover, Münden, and soldier camps at Limburg and Giessen.

*American Embassy, London,

Enclosure 1 in No. 16.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, July 17, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith, for transmission to the British Government, a copy of a report made by Dr. Karl Ohnesorg, Surgeon, United States navy, of visits made by him to the officer camps at Friedburg and Hannover, Münden, and soldier camps at Limburg and Giessen.

In this connection I beg to call attention to the fact that the Irish soldiers in the camp at Limburg are all Roman Catholics, and that several priests have been sent especially to care for them, at the instance, as I am informed, of His Holiness the Pope.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 16.

Dr. Ohnesorg to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

July 17, 1915.

I HAVE to report that on the 13th, 14th, and 15th July I visited the following camps: Friedberg (officers), Giessen and Limburg (men), and Hannover, Münden, (officers). All of these camps had been previously visited: Friedberg by the late Mr. Michelson, American consul-general at Cologne, and the others by me in April last and fully reported upon, so a detailed description of the camps will not now be made.

Friedberg.—The camp here is situated on the extreme outskirts of the town. The buildings used for the purposes of the camp are stone barracks, completed just before the outbreak of the war and the officers were their first occupants. This group of buildings is placed upon a high hill, affording a wide expanse of view over the surrounding country. The buildings are of stone and attractive in appearance. Two large three-storey buildings are used for housing the interned officers and their orderlies, a smaller building contains the kitchen, messroom, and shower-baths, and a fourth building, the "exercise hall," is a large, high-vaulted structure in one end of which are parallel bars, horizontal bars, &c., for gymnastic exercises. In the winter a tennis court had been placed in this building.

The officers' rooms are large, well ventilated by two large windows, lighted artificially by electricity, and supplied with good furniture. The beds are of iron with steel springs and each supplied with a good mattress. There was no overcrowding. The senior officers had rooms by themselves or were quartered with another officer.

In one of the buildings is a small infirmary for the treatment of mild cases of illness; any serious case of illness or wounds are treated in the hospital in the town. In the larger barrack is a large room fitted up as a chapel. Greek, Roman Catholic, and Protestant services were held here weekly.

There are interned here at present 300 officers, fourteen of whom are British. I saw all of them and talked with the majority alone, the senior two of the number, Lieutenant-Colonel Earle and Major Morrison Bell, accompanying me on my inspection of the grounds and buildings. I asked them concerning their treatment, messing arrangements, &c., and they all seemed to be satisfied and had no complaints to make.

Bathing facilities were excellent. Numerous showers had been installed, as well as two bath tubs. Warm water was supplied and baths permitted at any and all times.

These buildings are placed upon three sides of a large court. The space affords an excellent recreation ground. A tennis court had been laid out, and at the extreme end the space had been divided up into several small gardens, each of the officers having his own little flower garden. The officers spoke to me of the possibility of their being allowed to go out through the surrounding country for walks, under the guard of a German officer or non-commissioned officer. I spoke to the commandant concerning this and he said it was not within his power to grant this request, but he would speak to the Ministry of War concerning it. I would suggest that this be taken up with the proper authorities to see if this privilege cannot be granted them.

The following is a list of the British officers here interned :—

Maxwell Earle	Lieutenant-Colonel.
Morrison Bell	Major.
Eric Skaife	Captain.
John Shore	Captain.
Cecil Hutchison	Captain.
Herbert Master	Captain.
Ronald Dare Gillespie	Lieutenant.
Sidney Taylor	Lieutenant.
Jocelyn Mortan Lucas	1st Lieutenant.
William Colquhoun	1st Lieutenant.
James Allison	2nd Lieutenant.
Montague Chidson	Lieutenant Aviator.
Oswald Mansell-Moullin	Lieutenant Aviator.

Hannover, Münden.—It was most gratifying to see the improvements which had been accomplished in this camp. During my visit in April last it was far from satisfactory. Sanitary arrangements were poor, there was limited space for exercise and the building was overcrowded. The opposite of this I found on my recent visit. The camp is situated on the outskirts of the town of Münden, on the banks of the Weser river. The prison is a factory building, built of brick, situated on a main highway. It contains 600 officers, only two of whom are British; a third British officer had been transferred the day previous to Mainz.

The large rooms in the building have been divided by wooden partitions into rooms of about 35 ft. in length and 20 ft. in width. Not more than twelve officers occupy any one room. The two British officers have a room to themselves. The beds are of iron, steel springs, with straw mattresses and pillows; the bed linen was clean. Tables and chairs and a washstand completed the furniture of the room. Small lockers and hooks for the hanging of clothing, &c., were supplied each bed.

On the first floor was a large room used for messing purposes. The officers ate at small tables, seating eight. There was a large canteen with a well-assorted stock, articles being sold at moderate prices. The messing arrangements were very good. A committee of five, appointed by the officers themselves, managed their own mess. This scheme had only been inaugurated a short time before and the officers were satisfied with the food and the arrangement.

In one of the basement rooms of the building had been rigged several showers and bath tubs. Hot water was supplied and baths could be had whenever desired. The commandant compelled each officer and orderly to take a weekly bath.

In another room in the basement had been rigged a small chapel. Adjoining the building, and connected with it by a small passageway, was a wooden building which had been erected for a recreation hall. This building had one large room and four smaller ones ; in the latter I saw officers playing chess and, in one of them, a class of officers who were studying French and English. A library of well-selected books in Russian, French, and English was supplied. This building was erected by the Young Men's Christian Association, under the supervision of Mr. Hart, and had added materially to the comfort of the officers.

The grounds have been extended in area. A tennis court has been laid out as well as a space for bowling, and horizontal bars furnished. The extreme end of the enclosure has been cleared and numerous paths made through the trees with seats and small shelters.

The latrine, which was the source of much concern on my previous visit, was undergoing alterations, a flushing system being installed.

The whole compound is surrounded by a double line of barbed wire fencing, the space between being patrolled by sentries. There are no sentries within the compound.

The two British officers here confined are Major J. R. Ritson, Durham Light Infantry, and Lieutenant E. O. Bath, of the 48th Canadian Highlanders. Second Lieutenant J. J. Russell, Sussex Regiment, had been transferred the day previous to Mainz. I spoke with both of these officers outside of the hearing of the German officers. They said that their treatment had been in every respect correct and generous and that they had no complaints to make.

Fourteen British soldiers were interned here and acted as orderlies for interned officers. The majority of them needed uniforms ; a list of their needs has been supplied the British department.

Limburg.—In this camp there are about 2,300 Irish troops. They are quartered together and form the second battalion. Conditions were much the same as when I visited the camp in April last. I inspected thoroughly the barracks in which the Irish prisoners are confined, and talked with many of them alone, outside of hearing of the German officers. There was the usual complaint about the food. They all looked well nourished and appeared to be in good physical condition.

In the lazaret adjoining the camp were a few of the Irish troops who were under treatment for wounds and mild cases of illness.

Giessen.—My visit to this camp confirmed the first impression I received of its being one of the best organised, neatest, and most contented camps which I have visited. It contained only British and French prisoners, with a few Belgians ; the Russians had been all removed.

The camp, as I stated in a previous report, is divided into three battalions and each battalion into companies. Each company compound is fenced off and no communication is permitted between the various companies. French and British are housed together in these various barracks. They were segregated in the sense of one end of the building being reserved for the French and the other half for the British. Each barrack was under the direct supervision of a non-commissioned officer of the prisoners, who was responsible for its cleanliness and order. Seventeen hundred British troops were interned here, and of these 450 were Canadians. The latter were sadly in need of uniforms.

Since my previous visit in April an addition has been built to the camp, consisting of a large enclosure containing five large barracks, with separate kitchen. This was built for isolation purposes. Adjoining this was a newly erected disinfecting plant ; each prisoner admitted to the camp was first received here and his clothing and person thoroughly disinfected. There had also been established the rule that a weekly disinfection of each prisoner's clothing and person should be made. In the adjoining lazaret were a few British prisoners under treatment for wounds (all convalescing).

In both of these men's camps I found that many of the prisoners had been detailed for work in the surrounding country, i.e., in working camps. Giessen alone has 150 of these working camps under its control. I spoke with many of the prisoners alone concerning their treatment in these camps and the work they had to do. They said it was not hard, and before being allotted to these various working camps they underwent a thorough medical examination, and those who were found in an unfit physical condition were not detailed for this work. They are fed and housed by their employer, have a guard detailed over them, and in one instance I met a complaint of insufficient food. The commandant said that officers were detailed to inspect these various working camps, and when conditions such as improper housing or poor food were noticed, steps were immediately taken to remedy same.

I have, &c.

No. 17.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of his Excellency's note of the 24th ultimo,* enclosing reports by Dr. Ohnesorg on the prisoners' camps at Friedberg, Hannover-Munden, Limburg, and Giessen which have been received from the United States Ambassador at Berlin.

With regard to the report on Hannover-Munden, Sir E. Grey has failed to trace the report by Dr. Ohnesorg of his visit to this camp in April last.

Sir E. Grey fears that the absence of this report might possibly give rise to the impression that unfavourable news about the British prisoners in Germany is being withheld. Such an impression would greatly increase the public uneasiness on this subject, and would also put His Majesty's Government in rather an awkward position.

Sir E. Grey hopes therefore that he is right in assuming that Dr. Ohnesorg's first report was not sent him, owing to some accidental oversight, and that His Majesty's Government can continue to assure the public that they may rely on the completeness of the information in the reports so kindly furnished by the United States Embassy for which, as for all their other exertions, His Majesty's Government are unfeignedly grateful.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, August 3, 1915.

WITH reference to your letter of the 25th May last, with which was enclosed a copy of a note from Sir E. Grey of the 24th May last, to the effect that a number of British prisoners of war at the Citadel at Lille are believed to be undergoing great hardships, I have the honour to forward to you, herewith enclosed, for transmission to His Majesty's Government, copy of a despatch which has been received from the consul at Roubaix, who visited the Citadel on the 9th ultimo.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 18.

Mr. Watson to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

Roubaix, France, July 10, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to inform you that in accordance with your instructions, dated the 31st May, 1915, and received 1st July, 1915, I obtained permission yesterday morning from the German military authority to investigate the condition of the English prisoners of war in the Citadel of Lille. The investigation was made yesterday afternoon, and I hereby submit a report of same.

In the first place, the Citadel is only a temporary prison. The prisoners brought from the front are kept there one or two days at the most, before being sent to Germany. This is done in order to give them a little rest, as well as to arrange for their railroad transportation, for they are generally tired out when they arrive in Lille. The building in which the prisoners are confined is over 200 years old, and no conveniences have been installed. However, the place is clean and sanitary. There are no military prisoners in the Citadel at present.

The officers are quartered in separate rooms on the second storey, unless there is an unusually large number of them. In any case, each officer has a bed. The rooms are clean and there is sufficient furniture for the actual needs of the prisoners. The private soldiers are put into large rooms, averaging about 15 feet square. Straw mattresses are provided for them. All the windows are barred, as a matter of military necessity. There are two small courts, one for the use of the officers and the other for the soldiers. Both officers and soldiers are allowed to walk about in their respective courts during the day. This is the only means of exercise they have.

The food is plain, but wholesome, judging from what was shown. As there are no prisoners there just now, I could not learn what they thought of it. Three meals a day are given to all prisoners. Breakfast consists of coffee, tea, or cocoa and bread; dinner of soup, a piece of meat, vegetables and bread; and supper of bacon or eggs, bread and cheese. The prisoners are allowed to buy extra articles of food, tobacco, &c., in the Citadel canteen.

There is a hospital adjoining the prison, where the sick prisoners are cared for. Every morning at 9 o'clock those who are sick can have medical attendance.

The prisoners are not allowed to write letters in the Citadel, but as they are only kept there such a short time, this would not seem to be a hardship. From what I saw and heard, there is no foundation for the charge that the prisoners undergo great hardships. The officer in charge afforded me every facility in making this inspection.

I have, &c.

JOHN J. C. WATSON.

WITH reference to previous correspondence, I have the honour to forward to you, herewith enclosed, for transmission to His Majesty's Government, copies of reports upon visits to camps in Germany where British* prisoners of war are interned, as follows:—

Mr. Jackson's report of his visit to the camp for officer prisoners of war at Beeskow on the 5th instant; and

Dr. Ohnesorg's reports of visit to the camps at Sagan, Sprottau, Guben, and Crossen, on the 6th and 7th instant.

Enclosure 2 in No. 19.

Report by Mr. Jackson on his Visit to Camp for Prisoners of War at Beeskow.

THE officer prisoners at Beeskow are housed in an old building which was the "Schloss" of the local bishop in the sixteenth century. The building itself, which is rather antiquated, and its outhouses form four sides of a good-sized court. The accommodations are primitive and there is no electric light or running water except in the baths (hot and cold—shower and tub) which have been installed recently. The latrines, which are built over a cesspool, are also new, and they seem adequate and clean, affording more privacy than is usual. There is, however, no space for exercise outside the court itself, as since several officers attempted to escape no outside privileges are permitted. The "camp" was opened in the autumn of 1914, and for a long time it contained none but Russian officers. It is arranged to accommodate 120 prisoners, but at present there are only 112 in it. Captain J. H. Coulston, King's Own Regiment, who is still borne on this camp's books, was transferred to the hospital at Kottbus several weeks ago. Lieutenant J. R. Whyte* (see the British Foreign Office's note to the American Embassy in London of the 5th November, 1914), the only British officer present, was brought here from the men's camp in Döberitz in March. As companions he has several Russian officers (one of whose father was an Englishman) who speak English. Two of these Russian officers, with Lieutenant Whyte, attended a religious service held by the Reverend Mr. Williams, British chaplain in Berlin, who accompanied me on my visit. I talked freely with Mr. Whyte as well as with several Russian and French (of whom there are six in the camp) officers, and the one Belgian officer who was brought here recently from Blankenburg. None of the officers made any particular complaint except about the restricted exercise grounds. Several spoke of the lack of precaution in case of fire, and when I brought this matter to the attention of the commandant he promised to make an application to be supplied with fire extinguishers.

Lieutenant Whyte occupies a room with thirteen other officers, in which the beds are arranged in two tiers and are rather uncomfortably close together, although the air space in the room appears to be sufficient. The room has two barred windows, with an outlook on the garden surrounding the "Schloss." The officers who live in this room eat in it, there being no common mess-room for all the prisoners. There is a separate wash-room (basin and pitchers). There is also one room in which a considerable number of officers eat together, which is open at other times as a common room in which all may meet and smoke.

Officers pay 1'30 M. for their food, which the Belgian officer said was better than it had been at Blankenburg. The food is prepared by women cooks, and the self-management system has not been introduced. Two lieutenant-colonels (one French, the other Russian) occupy a room by themselves. The canteen seemed well stocked. Officers are permitted to buy beer and light wines, and to smoke freely. Mail and parcels appear to be received without unusual delay. The relations between the commandant and the officer prisoners seemed to be good, but the commandant told me that they were not so good as they had been when there were only Russian prisoners in the camp and before there had been any attempt made to escape. Four Russian officers, who had escaped from Neisse, but who had been caught before they had been able to cross the frontier, were brought here not long ago, and it would appear that the camp is to be used, more or less, for those who have shown that they do not appreciate more desirable quarters. In the camp there are twenty-four officers' servants, none of whom are English.

August 5, 1915.

* Note.—Second Lieutenant James Ryan Whyte (North Staffordshire Regiment) formerly sergeant, the Manchester Regiment. The ensuing reference is to a note addressed to the United States Ambassador requesting that steps might be taken with a view to this officer being treated similarly to prisoners of war of his rank.

Enclosure 3 in No. 19.

Dr. Ohnesorg to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

August 10, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to report that, on the 6th and 7th August, I visited the following prisoner of war camps: Sagan, Sprottau, Guben, and Crossen.

These camps are similar in construction to other German camps, being divided into units of 500 to 1,000 men. The greater per cent. of the prisoners of war, two-thirds or three-quarters, had been detailed for work in "Arbeitslagern" in the surrounding country. The prisoners so detailed were Russians and French, the former making up the greater majority and volunteering for this work. In none of the camps visited did I find any British prisoners detailed in these working camps. I conversed freely with all of the British prisoners out of the hearing of any German officer, hearing the usual criticism of the food but no important complaint on other grounds. They were all clothed well and were in uniform, with the exception of three in Guben. Shoes were in good condition. The German authorities show no discrimination against them. The usual mail privileges are permitted, and they all receive their letters and packages regularly from home. They all appeared to be in good physical condition and only one was confined in the hospital, for some trivial complaint. All of the British prisoners in the camps are quartered together in the same barracks. The four interned at Sagan desired to be transferred to some other camp where there were more of their own countrymen.

Crossen.—The plan of this camp is different from those previously seen. In the centre of the compound is a large circular space in the middle of which is a large mound surmounted by a tower, around which are placed three 3-inch field pieces whose fire would control the whole camp. Radiating off from this, like the spokes of a wheel, are the company compounds. These courts are surrounded on three sides by the barracks, large wooden buildings housing 500 men each. There are bunks placed in either end; these are arranged in three tiers—three-deckers. The space in the centre of each building is furnished with tables, chairs, &c. There is no overcrowding and light and ventilation are good. Latrines are sanitary. The cooking, bathing facilities, &c., are good. The men must bathe and have their clothing disinfected once a week.

A large tailor and shoe shop was part of the equipment of the camp, prisoners being employed in the work. A feature of interest was a large carpenter shop where Russian and French were employed in making furniture, &c. All of those employed in the camp in these shops and those employed in the kitchen receive pay for their work—30–60 pfennige per diem. I was shown the bank, where there was on deposit, according to the commandant, 125,000 M. to the credit of the prisoners. This is in charge of a German officer ("Feldwebel") with assistants from among the prisoners.

Mr. Harte, of the Young Men's Christian Association, has erected here a building similar to the one described at Göttingen. This is used as a reading hall, &c. A library of French, Russian, and English books—several hundred volumes—was seen. An orchestra of twenty-two pieces, the instruments supplied by Mr. Harte, gives daily concerts. This building is also used for religious services.

The hospital facilities were good. Four Russian surgeons with hospital corps men from among the Russians and Germans, all under the direction of a German surgeon, form the personnel of the lazaret. The camp crowns the top of a high hill; the surrounding acres are under cultivation, the work being accomplished by prisoners.

The camp at Guben is placed about 8 kilom. from the city. Its general plan is exactly like that of the camp at Crossen. There were here interned thirteen British prisoners—all Irish.

The camps at Sagan and Sprottau are similar in construction and organisation to the camps so often described. The barracks are solidly built of wood on stone foundations. The prisoners are divided into battalions, each battalion further divided into companies. A prisoner non-commissioned officer is in direct charge of each barrack, and each company is under the command of a German "Unteroffizier." The kitchens, bathing facilities, canteen, and latrines are sufficient in number and well kept.

The many working camps which are dependent on these parent camps are scattered throughout the country adjacent to these parent camps. Crossen had 150. Officers are constantly engaged in visiting these camps, each camp receiving a weekly visit. Special regulations governing these "Arbeitslagern" are in force.

Appended are lists of the British prisoners of war. I would suggest that an effort be made to have the four interned at Sagan transferred to another camp, as it is their wish to be where there are a greater number of their countrymen.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 23rd April last, transmitting a list of the camps in Germany at which British prisoners of war are interned, has the honour to state that he would be grateful if Mr. Page would enquire of the United States Ambassador at Berlin whether that list is still complete and accurate, and, if not, whether Mr. Gerard would be good enough to transmit a revised list.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 14th instant* transmitting reports on the prisoner of war camps at Beeskow, Sagan, Sprottau, Guben, and Crossen, has the honour to state that he would be glad if Mr. Page would be good enough to convey his thanks to the United States Ambassador at Berlin to Mr. Jackson and to Surgeon Karl Ohnesorg for the trouble they have taken in the compilation of these reports.

Sir E. Grey has the honour to observe that the report on the camp at Beeskow discloses somewhat unsatisfactory conditions as prevailing there, and he would be grateful if Mr. Gerard would approach the proper authorities with a view to an improvement being effected in the treatment of the prisoners, more particularly with a view to securing to them a larger exercise ground and better sleeping and messing arrangements.

It is not clear, moreover, why Lieutenant J. R. Whyte should, on promotion, have been sent to a camp which is apparently to be used, more or less, for prisoners of war who have shown that they do not appreciate more desirable quarters.

Sir E. Grey has also the honour to express the hope that it may be found possible to remove the four British soldiers at Sagan to another camp where there are a greater number of their countrymen.

Enclosure 2 in No. 22.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Meschede, in Westphalia.

THE camp at Meschede, on a hill near the railway station just outside the town, was opened in the early autumn of 1914. It is beautifully situated in a healthy place, and the water is particularly good. This camp was one of the first constructed, and the former commandant tried to be economical in its construction, but even so its original cost was more than a million marks. The present commandant, who has been in command for only a few weeks, seems to take more interest in the camp, and he expects to be able to spend almost as much more in its improvement. The camp is arranged for 10,000 prisoners of war, who are divided into two battalions and housed in barracks, which accommodate 500 men each. All the barracks are provided with stoves, which are, of course, not in use at this season of the year. All Russian prisoners were transferred to other camps some time ago, and many others have been sent off on working parties, so that at present there are only about 2,000 in the camp, most of whom are French, and most of whom are unfit for agricultural work. Of this number there are only thirteen English and Canadian soldiers, eight of whom are in the lazaret, whose names are appended hereto. A few weeks ago, about 130 British prisoners had been transferred to the camp at Giessen. With all the British soldiers except three, who are in the infectious ward of the hospital, I talked freely, out of hearing of any German, and none had any important complaint to make. The food, which I tasted, was good, and the menu for the week was varied. The French cooks told me that the material furnished is good, and I saw that the kitchens are clean and well arranged. Meat is provided about three times a week. The canteens seemed well stocked. The baths are well arranged, each prisoner being obliged to bathe once a week, and there is also a disinfection plant. The latrines are clean and sufficient, but are situated at a considerable distance from some of the barracks. Throughout the compound there are hydrants, from which water can be obtained for drinking and washing purposes. Owing to the fact that the camp is built on a hillside, there is no suitable ground for games, but the commandant himself has provided "Faustbälle" (footballs), which the men seem to appreciate. The men have planted gardens near their barracks, and in this they are encouraged by the authorities. After a rain the roads in the camp and the gangways between the barracks get bad, on account of the quality of the soil and the kind of stone (shale) which was used in building, but new corduroy roads (railway cross-ties) are to be built before the winter.

The lazaret is in a neighbouring compound, and is clean and well arranged. The sick have beds and a special diet. Attention appears to be paid to the tastes of the prisoners, for when we tasted the hospital food the commandant expressed the opinion that one dish was not sweetened enough. To this the French cook replied that the soldiers preferred it that way.

Corporal Clarence Wood, 10th Canadian Battalion.
 Armour-Corporal Peter McGovern, 10th Canadian Battalion.
 Private Harry Ramsey, Royal Field Artillery.
 Private John Workman, Royal Highlanders of Canada.
 Private James Gibson, 1st East Lancashire Regiment.
 Private Sidney Beckett, 12th London Infantry.
 Private Isaac Jamfrey, 8th Durham Light Infantry (right leg amputated).
 Private William Kean, 1st Royal Warwick Regiment (left leg amputated).
 Private Eustace Chappelow, 10th Canadian Battalion (right leg amputated).
 Private John C. Finley, 14th Royal Montreal Regiment.
 Corporal Walter Haydon (628), 2nd London Heavy Artillery.
 Corporal W. H. Walsh (27849), 48th Highlanders, 1st Canadian Contingent.
 Michael Wright (30855), Royal Field Artillery.

Notes.

(a.) Private Gibson would like a new cap and a suit of uniform; height 5 ft. 6 in., chest 38 inches. Private Finley would like a suit of uniform; height 6 feet, chest 37 inches. He would also like a pair of boots, as his feet are large, and those furnished by the German Government are too small for him.

(b.) As several of these men had received no money or parcels from home, I felt at liberty to leave 100 M. (British fund) with the commandant of the camp, to be distributed among them.

August 11, 1915.

Enclosure 3 in No. 22.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Wahmbeck an der Weser.

THE officers' camp at Wahmbeck was opened just eight weeks ago, and is as yet not entirely in order. The building is an old-fashioned hotel, lately frequented as a summer resort by persons of moderate means. Under former conditions it would accommodate about sixty guests, but at present it contains 99 officers (8 British, 7 Belgian, 40 French, and 44 Russian), all of whom were transferred from Osnabrück in June. With the British and several of the other officers I talked freely. They live in rooms of various sizes, accommodating from three to ten each, which would be overcrowded in the winter, but which cannot be considered as over-filled at this season, when the windows are open most of the time. The officers were permitted to choose their own room mates, and although all the Englishmen do not room together, there was no complaint on this score. The dining rooms are bright, but there are no other common rooms for general use. There is a piano in the building, the use of which is permitted. The officers said that the food was good, and that, as my time was limited, they did not think it necessary for me to inspect the kitchen. The baths are open at all times, and the officers may take shower baths (warm and cold water) whenever they like. They are also permitted to swim in the Weser river at certain hours. The day latrines are clean, and afford more privacy than is usual, and there is to be an improvement in the water-closet for use at night, which is at present not altogether satisfactory. I learned that several minor wishes on the part of the prisoners, which they brought to my attention, had already been considered by the commandant who, I found, was inclined to fulfil them when practicable and to make conditions generally as agreeable as possible. There had been some delay in the receipt of letters and parcels, but this question was rectifying itself. The prisoners are encouraged to plant vegetables in individual garden plots, and many of them have done so. The garden, however, is not large, and the prisoners complained of lack of space in which to exercise. The commandant has already taken up this question with the authorities, and he is already arranging to have certain gymnastic apparatus provided. In general, the officers found their prolonged confinement irksome, but that is inevitable in the case of those who have now been prisoners for almost a year. The names of the British officers in this camp have already been communicated to the British Government.

There are at present only ten officers' servants (one British) in this camp, but an increase in the number has been recommended by the commandant.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and has the honour to inform his Excellency that serious complaints have reached His Majesty's Government in regard to the conditions prevailing at the prisoner-of-war camp at Gardelegen, as to which some account was given in the reports enclosed in Mr. Page's note of the 23rd April.*

The Army Council are anxious to obtain, if possible, information as to the clothing of the prisoners; the opportunities afforded them for recreation, and any restrictions which may be imposed on it; the ventilation of the rooms; the facilities for washing; and the quantity and quality of the latrine accommodation.

Grave statements have also reached this country as to the conditions which obtained at Gardelegen owing to the typhus epidemic, to which Surgeon Ohnesorg refers as having rendered it impossible for him to make a complete personal inspection at the time of his visit in April.

As it is very desirable to obtain a full report on the camp, Sir E. Grey will be grateful if Mr. Page will communicate with the United States Ambassador at Berlin on the subject, and ask if Mr. Gerard will be good enough—on the assumption that the epidemic has now ceased—to send a representative of the Embassy to visit personally the camp at Gardelegen, and to report on the conditions which he may find there.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, August 23, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith copies of a report made to me by Surgeon Karl Ohnesorg, U.S.N., and Mr. Ellis L. Dresel, members of my staff, of a visit paid by them to the officer prisoner of war camps at Neisse and Gnadenfrei, in Silesia, on the 23rd instant.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 25.

Mr. Dresel and Surgeon Ohnesorg to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

August 23, 1915.

WE have the honour to submit the following report on the prisoner of war camps for officers at Neisse and Gnadenfrei. These two camps were visited on the 20th August, 1915:—

Neisse.—In the centre of the town are the barracks and parade ground. It is upon the latter that the camp has been built. Two-storey frame buildings house the officer prisoners. The entrance is on the side, and longitudinal partitions divide the building into four rooms. The eight British officers occupied one room, and were not over-crowded. Iron bedsteads with springs, a mattress of sea-grass, with blanket, pillow, and a spread of calico, chairs, tables, shelves, and hooks for hanging clothes, &c., completed the furnishings of the room.

The new system of messing has been inaugurated here. Committees from among the prisoners had direct charge of the mess and canteen. The British and French officers refused to serve on these committees, and both were made up of Russian officers. These arranged a weekly menu, which was submitted to a German officer, who bought the food. They messed in a building within the compound which in ordinary times served as a "casino" for German non-commissioned officers. The mess-room was small, necessitating two "sittings." Russian cooks were employed in the kitchen. 1.50 M. was allowed each officer per diem for food. A canteen, in which various toilet articles, beer, light wines, fruit, &c., were sold at moderate prices, was placed in the same building. In the German officers' part of the permanent barracks were the bathing facilities. These consisted of a dressing-room adjoining the room, in which was placed eight shower-baths, hot water being supplied. Each officer prisoner had an opportunity for a weekly bath. The latrines were brick buildings in the rear of the compound, and were too few in number. Additions had been built, but the work there had been stopped because the commandant informed us that the camp was soon to be given up.

Stretching across the compound was a new brick building, which was erected as a stable. The floor was cement; the rooms clean, and free from odour. It had the appearance of never having been used for stabling horses. In this building were housed the seventy orderlies, the majority being Russian, a few French, and a British enlisted man. These men received the ration of the German soldiers forming the guard of the camp.

The riding-ring was used as a chapel. Services of the Church of Rome, the Greek Church, and Protestant services were held here every Sunday, one of the British officers reading the service of the Church of England, an interned Russian priest conducting the services of the Greek Church, and priests of the Roman Catholic Church from the town of Neisse being entrusted with the spiritual welfare of those of their faith.

The area for exercise within the compound was very limited; no games, such as tennis, were permitted in the open, and an old riding hall used for this purpose was very unsatisfactory. The officer prisoners—a company at a time, under guard—were twice a week given a two-hour walk through the country around the city, and those who were crippled because of wounds had been permitted to hire carriages, and, with a guard, drive about the country, and thus gained some relief from the monotony of prison life.

Because of attempts made on the part of some Russian officers to escape, some of the liberties of all the interned officers had been curtailed. The space between the officer barracks and the buildings on the east side of the compound was not permitted to be used after 6.30 P.M. They were not permitted out of their barracks after 9 P.M. The toilet facilities for use during the night consisted of a closed stool placed in the main hallway of the building. Lights (electric) were ordered out at 10 P.M.

This prison camp is far from being satisfactory, and it is a relief to learn that it is soon to be given up. It is only fair to the German authorities to state that improvements—such as the additions to the latrines, and the installation of showers in a room in the building within the compound—have not been undertaken because the camp is soon to be vacated. 296 officers and 70 orderlies are interned here, 228 being Russian, 60 French, and 8 British officers. A list of the latter is appended.

Gnadenfrei.—A modern stone and brick building, used in times of peace as a school for boys, under the direction of a Lutheran brotherhood, is used for the prison camp. 350 officers (Russians, 227; French, 60; British, 8; and Belgians, 5) and 78 enlisted men (1 British soldier) used for orderlies are interned here. The camp had only been established since the 2nd August, the officers and men being transferred from Neisse. The building is modern, built of stone, heated by steam, and lighted by electricity. This is the only camp (officers or men) which we have visited where we have found the guard of German soldiers living in the same building with the prisoners of war. As a result of the space allotted for housing them (100 in number), it has greatly reduced the amount of room for the interned officers, and they are overcrowded. The eight English officers occupy one room, 21 feet by 22 feet by 13 feet—entirely too small. This is the case throughout the whole building. The rooms are, however, well lighted and ventilated.

The same scheme of messing as that met with in Neisse is in force here, and the British have one officer on the committee. The dining-room is small, necessitating three "sittings," so that the midday meal is in progress for some two hours and a half. Morning coffee and the evening meal are usually had in the officers' rooms. We had the midday meal with the British officers—a soup, a very good fish, boiled potatoes, with a sauce and cheese and crackers. Beer, light wines, &c., are purchasable in the canteen. There was no complaint on the part of the officers regarding the food. The kitchens were in the basement, and there was need of additional cooking utensils which the commandant informed me had been ordered. He also said that French cooks would be sent there. The bathing facilities were found in one of the basement rooms; they consisted of a dozen showers, hot-water supply, and an adjoining dressing-room. The latrines were placed at one corner of the compound, in a wooden building with trench system, entirely too small for the number of officers. We were informed by the commandant that as soon as an additional water supply was furnished by an artesian well now being sunk this disagreeable feature would be obviated by using the toilets in the building.

In the rear of the building was a small court; a tennis court had been laid out, and some of the French officers were playing at bowls in another corner of the compound. A small building fitted up as a gymnasium was placed at one side of the court. This, at the time of our visit, was temporarily closed, because of an unsuccessful attempt made to escape by tunnelling under the building.

The complaints of the officers were those of a minor nature, and we discussed them with the commandant later.

We are most strongly of the opinion that the German guard should be removed from the building. The principle seems wrong, and its removal would greatly lessen the overcrowding of the interned officers. A list of the interned British officers is appended.

We have, &c.

No. 27.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and with reference to his Excellency's note of the 28th ultimo,* transmitting reports by Surgeon Karl Ohnesorg, U.S.N., and Mr. E. L. Dresel, as to visits paid by them to the officer prisoner of war camps at Neisse and Gnadenfrei, has the honour to state, in regard to the former camp, that the report of these gentlemen does not seem to invalidate the grounds of complaint to which attention was drawn in his note of the 20th ultimo.† Sir E. Grey notes, however, that the camp is about to be given up, and he trusts that no time will be lost in transferring the British prisoners to more suitable quarters.

In regard to the camp of Gnadenfrei, Sir E. Grey is much obliged to Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Dresel for drawing attention to the housing of the guard in the same building as the prisoners of war, with the result of greatly overcrowding the already limited space available for the latter, and of the eight British officers being thus obliged to inhabit a room much too small for the purpose, and for their remarks as to the insufficient latrine accommodation.

Sir E. Grey trusts that he may be informed at an early date that the improvements contemplated by the commandant have been productive of satisfactory results.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, September 4, 1915.

WITH reference to your letter of the 31st ultimo, enclosing a copy of a note from the British Foreign Office, dated the 28th August,* I have the honour to inform you that ten British prisoners of war were transferred from the camp at Meschede to that at Giessen on the 30th August, and that the only Englishmen who remain in the Meschede camp are Privates Isaac Jamfrey, William Kean, and Eustace Chappelow. (See list appended to report enclosed in my letter of the 16th August.) Of these men Mr. Jackson's memorandum shows that Jamfrey had received parcels from home, but the other two had not. As each of these men had lost a leg, it is probable that they will be sent to England with a "severely wounded" transport as soon as they are able to be moved.

In this connection, I beg to say that, as men in the lazaret at Meschede are not permitted to smoke, the commandant of that camp has, of his own notion, forwarded to the camp at Giessen the cigarettes (1,000) which had been sent to him for the British prisoners, with a request that they be distributed among ten men who had just been transferred, as a gift from the Imperial Tobacco Company, transmitted through the Prisoners of War Help Committee and this Embassy.

I have, &c.

No. 29.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 28th May* transmitting a report by Mr. Jackson in regard to the conditions prevailing in the prisoners of war camp at Bischofswerda, has the honour to inform Mr. Page that His Majesty's Government have grounds for fearing that since the date of Mr. Jackson's visit the conditions at that camp have undergone some change for the worse, and that the treatment of officer prisoners is no longer so satisfactory as when described by that gentleman in May.

Sir E. Grey would be grateful to the United States Ambassador at Berlin if his Excellency would be good enough to bear this matter in mind, and to take steps to ascertain the present state of the camp at Bischofswerda as soon as an opportunity for obtaining direct and reliable information presents itself.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, September 11, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith a copy of a report of visits paid by Mr. Jackson to Minden, the lazarets in Paderborn, the military and civilian camp at Sennelager, and the officers' camp at Bad Blenhorst, and to be, &c.

Enclosure 2 in No. 30.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Minden.

ALTHOUGH Minden was mentioned on the list recently furnished by the Prussian Ministry of War as among the places where British prisoners of war were interned, I was met on my arrival at the railway station by the commandant, who told me that all the British prisoners had been transferred within the last few days, and that the last had left one of the lazarets yesterday. He said that there were no longer any British prisoners in the camps or lazarets in Minden, and that the camps were to be used for Russian prisoners only in the future.

September 9, 1915.

Enclosure 3 in No. 30.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Paderborn.

IN Paderborn there is no "prisoners' camp," but there are a number of lazarets in which British prisoners of war are being treated, all of which (four) I visited to-day. At the Brüderhaus there were two Canadian officers, Lieutenants William A. de C. O'Grady and C. R. Scott (who are permitted to occupy a small room by themselves, for which they pay 3 marks per day apiece) and three men, one of whom is no longer undergoing treatment, but is kept on—in accordance with his expressed wish—to help care for the others. In this hospital the death took place recently of Lieutenant B. H. Richardson, Durham Light Infantry, whose family has already been informed of the fact. In the Kaiserhof there were eighteen men, in the Franziskaner there were a Lieutenant Evans and fifteen men, and at St. Vincents there were Lieutenant F. H. Ellis, 2nd Battalion King's Own (Royal Lancaster Regiment) and five men. As the names of all these men have already appeared on lists which have been furnished to the British Government I did not take a list of them. All the men, with the exception of one—of Swedish origin—in the Kaiserhof, who had written no letters, are in touch with their friends at home. Most of these lazarets had been visited yesterday by Mr. Harte, of the American Y.M.C.A., who had either left money or purchased games (dominoes, checkers, lotto, &c.) for the men. There are no longer any British prisoners in the Leo Konvikt. Besides the English there are officers and men of other nationalities in all these lazarets.

In none of these lazarets did the men have any complaint to make, and all said that they were being treated with great care and kindness. The only criticism which I heard was at the Kaiserhof where one or two men said that it was difficult for them to keep clean-shaven as they were not allowed to have razors in their possession. Some of the men said to me that it would be necessary to drive them away (that they would make no attempt to escape), because they are so well cared for and so comfortable. As the men become convalescent they are sent to the Sennelager. Officers are generally sent to Gutersloh.

September 9, 1915.

Enclosure 4 in No. 30.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Senne.

AS a report had been made of the Sennelager Camps by Mr. Osborne, after a visit on the 20th April, as no unfavourable criticism of them had come to the attention of the Embassy in the meantime except with regard to Camp No. 1, and as my time was limited, I did not visit Camps 2 and 3. In Camp No. 1, I talked on the 9th September with the senior British non-commissioned officer, Company Sergeant-Major W. Crack, of the 2nd Suffolk Regiment, and several men. In this camp there are about 340 British prisoners, one of whom claims to belong to the R.A.M.C., but who has as yet been unable to prove it. This man's case has been brought to the attention of the Imperial Foreign Office. These men appeared to be in good physical condition as a rule, and none of them had any important complaint to make about their present treatment.

The senior non-commissioned officer accompanied me, together with the commandant, on my inspection of the camp, and at his request I paid especial attention to the men in the Revier-Stube—a kind of lazaret where men are put when slightly ill, in which I found one man who had been a prisoner since the beginning of the war whose wound (in the left arm) had not healed. The commandant told me that this man's case would be brought especially to the attention of the military doctor who attends this camp daily but who was absent at the time of my visit, with a view to his being sent to a lazaret in Paderborn. There had recently been a change in the medical officer and the men said that the new one was a great improvement over his predecessor. In this camp the men bathe in rotation, an obligatory bath being taken every ten to fourteen days. In the camp there have been no epidemics. Some of the men complained of being forced to work, but they appeared to be satisfied when I told them that I understood that the German authorities had the right to compel them to do so. Rev. H. M. Williams, British Chaplain in Berlin, had held religious services in the Senne camps about a week before my visit.

Adjoining Camp 1, there is a civilian camp in which there are about 3,000 prisoners, 198 of whom are British. Most of these men are sailors or British subjects who were brought from Belgium. About twenty of them are men who claim to have been combatants and who say that they exchanged their uniforms for civilian clothes in Belgium and were captured while trying to cross the frontier to Holland. The commandant told me that he would investigate these cases, and would transfer to the military camp all those who could convince him that they had actually belonged to the fighting force.

In this camp, as is usual where civilians are detained, the atmosphere is one of depression. Most of the men have been prisoners for at least a year, and they cannot understand why they are detained. Besides, many of the non-British prisoners are men who were taken from jails in Belgium, with whom the British prisoners do not like to associate. The prisoners are not housed by nationalities, and, in consequence, the British prisoners are distributed throughout the several barracks. Each barracks has a prisoner "adjutant," only one of whom is an Englishman.

The question of bringing all the Englishmen into one barracks has been brought to the attention of the Prussian Ministry of War, where it was said that it would be taken into consideration, but that all the English would be transferred to Ruhleben as soon as there should be sufficient accommodation for them there, which, it is anticipated, will be at an early date in view of the number of invalids who are to be released and sent to England. In principle, civilians are not compelled to do work outside of the camp, but here an opportunity for work (with small remuneration) is provided.

Some confusion has been caused by the fact that the non-British "adjutants" have announced Englishmen as volunteers for work (intentionally or owing to misunderstanding), who said that they had not volunteered, and who refused to go to work when called on to do so, and have been punished in consequence. One of the punishments has been enforced drill, marches with knapsacks filled with bricks, which is one of the regular German forms of punishment for insubordinate soldiers, but which is objected to strenuously by the civilians. On my calling attention to this matter, the commandant said that he would see that no misunderstanding should take place in the future, and that the Englishmen would not be called upon to work except in connection with the camp itself unless they actually volunteered.

There were some complaints, as usual, in regard to the food. I had arrived in the camp just after the mid-day meal was served, and while some of the men said that the meat had been bad, and they wished that I had had an opportunity to taste it, others said that the meat had been particularly good, because the officers had heard that I was coming. None of them knew that I had actually eaten a plate of their soup and had found it excellent, both palatable and nutritious, and that my visit to this particular camp had not been announced in advance. The menu for the day had been made out at the beginning of the week, and could not have been changed after my presence in the camp was known, and I had a bowl of the soup which was left over after the prisoners had been served. Mr. Harte, of the American Y.M.C.A., visited these civilians on the day before my visit, and left a small amount of money for distribution among them. An amount of 1,000 M. had been sent to them by the Embassy from British funds in July, and arrangements will be made to send them money from time to time as seems necessary in the future. Clothing has been furnished to them by the German authorities when necessary.

September 11, 1915.

Enclosure 5 in No 30.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Detention Camp at Blenhorst, near Nienburg a/d Weser.

BAD BLENHORST is situated on the edge of the so-called "Lüneburger Heide," about 8 miles from the railway station at Nienburg a/d Weser. Its mud baths enjoy considerable reputation as being good for cases of rheumatism, ischias, and gout. About six weeks ago the local Kurhaus was opened as an officers' camp, and 96 officer prisoners are now housed in it (46 Russian, 38 French, 8 Belgian, and 6 English). These officers had been especially selected as being likely to be benefited by the "cure," and under the care of a German military surgeon they are taking regular courses of baths. The quarters occupied are rather cramped, but the officers are willing to put up with this inconvenience because of the other advantages and attractions of the place. The Kurhaus is in a good-sized park, partially wooded, which is surrounded by a barbed wire fence. There are no guards on duty within this enclosure, in which there is an open lawn where the prisoners may sit in the sun, a tennis court, bowling alley, and a pond in which fishing is permitted. The sanitary arrangements are primitive but appear to be sufficient. The house is lighted throughout by electricity, and a central heating system is about to be installed. The baths are on the opposite side of the country road, in the neighbourhood of the houses occupied by the German officers and guards. Within the main enclosure there is a second wire fence surrounding the house, which is closed at night. There is much wood throughout the house, and on speaking of the possible danger of fire the commandant said that extinguishers were to be provided, and that various improvements and alterations are to be made in the house itself before winter. Officers pay 1.50 M. per day for their meals, and they spoke well of them. The catering is done by the proprietor of the Kurhaus, and there is a canteen which seemed well stocked with miscellaneous articles at moderate prices. With the exception of the general mess room, the only common room is a small one, in which there is a piano which the officers are permitted to use. Another (better) piano has been ordered at, I understand, the officers' expense. The officer prisoners sleep in the regular guests' rooms in the hotel—from two to six in a room. The English officers do not all room together, but they are satisfied with the existing arrangement, although the rooms are so crowded that the wardrobes and some of the washstands are compelled to be in the corridors. Any officer who objected to this would, however, probably be permitted to return to his former camp at once if he wished to do so. The relations between the officer prisoners and the commandant appeared to be exceedingly cordial, and the commandant is ready to do all that he can to make matters comfortable for them. While any officer is at liberty to approach him and to make known his individual wishes or complaints, a regular committee has been formed to confer with the commandant on matters of general interest. I talked freely with all the English and several of the Belgian, French, and Russian officers. There had been some delay about mail, owing to the fact that it is censored in the camp at Soltau and not at Blenhorst itself.

The English officers present were Major Ernest Doughty (Suffolks), Captain George Bellville (16th Lancers), Lieutenant Herbert Meredith (4th battalion King's Regiment), and R. S. Moore (16th Lancers), who had come from Osnabrück, Captain A. S. Fraser (Dorset Regiment), and a Captain Ward, who had come from Crefeld, and who spoke in very complimentary terms of the conditions existing in that camp at present.

Among the officers' servants is one English soldier, who had come from Osnabrück with Major Doughty.

IN reply to your letter of the 6th instant, I have the honour to inform you that since the visits paid to the camps at Neisse and Gnadenfrei by Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Dresel, those camps have been inspected by an officer from the Prussian Ministry of War, and steps have been taken to remedy the overcrowding and to remove other causes for complaint. The number of officer prisoners at Gnadenfrei is likely to be reduced, and in any event the guard is to be housed in a separate building as soon as one can be constructed, which will probably be at an early date.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, September 21, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to enclose herewith a copy of a report made to me by Dr. Karl Ohnesorg, surgeon, United States navy, of a visit paid to the officers' camp at Clausthal on the 16th instant.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 33.

Dr. Ohnesorg to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, September 21, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to report that on the 16th September I visited the officers' prisoner of war camp at Clausthal.

The building used for internment of these officer prisoners of war is a "kurhaus." It is a wooden building, on stone foundations, placed on a main highway on the outskirts of the town.

I found here interned a total of 174 officer prisoners and 24 men acting as orderlies and servants for the officers: 37 French, 74 Belgian, 42 Russian, and 21 British officers. Of the 24 men, 3 were British soldiers.

The building was modern, eight years old, and in peace time was used as a hotel, being one of the many "kurhauses" which abound through this section of the Hartz Mountains. It is situated, as stated previously, on a main highway, the camp being screened off from this roadway by a high board fence, topped with the usual barbed wire. A moderate-sized yard, approximately 100 yards long by 90 yards broad, in the rear of the building served as a recreation ground for the officers. The space in front of the building was laid out with walks, on which were placed benches and steamer chairs. In pleasant weather the roll-call was held in the space in front of the building. At one side of the main building was being erected a small building, which, I was informed, was to be used as a squash racket court by the English officers. I found several of the English officers amusing themselves in the yard with golf balls and sticks. An open-air bowling alley had been erected, and a tennis court was in process of construction.

I talked freely with all the English officers outside the hearing of any of the German officers. They had no complaints to make concerning their treatment. They messed together in a large hall in the building, and informed me that their food was of good quality and sufficiently varied. An adjoining canteen gave them an opportunity of purchasing necessary articles at moderate prices, and other articles could be purchased on requisition from the stores in the town.

The officers of various nationalities were housed together in rooms of various sizes, and the only criticism I might make of the camp is that it was a bit overcrowded. This condition is recognised by the German authorities themselves, and on a recent visit of the general inspector of the 10th Army, in which district the camp is placed, he remarked on this fault, and promised to remedy it. It is their intention to remove the Russian officers, forty-two in number, which will solve this question of overcrowding.

At present the officers have to walk a distance of half a mile for their weekly baths, but several showers with hot and cold water had recently been installed in a large room in the building, and this would be shortly opened for the use of the interned when an additional water supply—an extra tank—could be installed in the building.

The twenty-four orderlies lived together in a large room in the attic. I talked with the three English soldiers; they were satisfied with their surroundings and treatment, and preferred to remain where they were, instead of being sent to some prisoner of war camp for men.

The house was heated by hot-water system. The open porches on the various floors, the commandant informed me, were to be enclosed with glass for the winter.

The usual privileges concerning mail were permitted, and the packages and other incoming mail were received regularly and censored in the usual way.

The situation of the camp is ideal, being placed in the midst of the Hartz Mountains, with a wide expanse of view, and my visit gave me a very favourable impression in general.

Appended is a list of the interned British officers, and the names of the three British soldiers acting as orderlies.

I also append a small photograph of the "kurhaus."

Enclosure 2 in No. 35.

Report on Visit to Detention Camp at Gardelegen.

ALTHOUGH Dr. Ohnesorg was unable to go inside the camp when he visited Gardelegen in April, he described its general character fully in his report, and all the R.A.M.C. officers who were interned therein, and who have now been sent back to England, are in a position to supplement that report if additional information is desired by the British Government. Within a day or two after Captain Williams, R.A.M.C., left, nearly all the British soldiers were transferred to the camp at Stendal or sent off on working parties, so that I found only nine Englishmen in the camp to-day. With each of these men I talked individually, out of hearing of any German, and none of them had any complaint to make, although I told them particularly that I had come to ask them if anything was going wrong. They said that their relations with the German soldiers now are much better than they had been before the quarantine was raised. They do not like the clothing which is given them and they expressed themselves as dissatisfied with the food, but said that that made no difference, as they lived almost entirely from what was sent them from England. I had tasted the midday soup in the kitchen of one battalion before it was served out, and had tasted what was left in one of the kettles after serving in the other. The soup was the same and good in both cases. All the men looked in good physical condition and seemed to be in fairly good spirits, although they have been prisoners for the greater part of a year. They are all in communication with their friends at home, and receive letters and parcels frequently. The rule which was in force in regard to correspondence while the camp was in quarantine has not been changed as yet, and the men are not permitted to send letters out of camp, but instead are allowed to send an extra number of post-cards. Two of these men are in the lazaret, with wounds in their legs. Their cases are known to Captain Williams. In one case the wound has opened again owing to the presence of a splinter of bone, which the German and Russian surgeons say could easily be removed if the man were willing to have it done. The lazaret was clean and well kept. There are still French and Russian medical officers in the camp, one section of which is again in quarantine owing to the fact that cholera has been found to exist among some Russian prisoners who had been brought in recently. The disease did not spread to the rest of the camp and it has already disappeared.

The camp is arranged to accommodate 14,000 prisoners, but is relatively empty at present, owing to the fact that most of the men are off on working parties. Most of the Englishmen sleep together in one barracks, which did not seem overcrowded. I was told that the two British non-commissioned officers are to be moved to other quarters (a small room) in a few days. The latrines are primitive, but were remarkably free from odour.

The commandant, Colonel Grüner, and the senior German medical officer accompanied me in my inspection of the camp. My visit had been announced by telegraph the evening before.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 36.

Report on Visit to Detention Camp at Cüstrin.

AT Cüstrin two of the forts which form part of the fortress have been arranged to accommodate officer prisoners of war. In the "Fort Gorgast" there are about 200 Russians, but no English, and, in consequence, I made no inspection. In the "Fort Zorndorf" there are 147 Russian and thirty-three French officers, and one Englishman, Major Eric Jackson, of the Cheshire Regiment. In so far as the French are concerned, this fort is a "reprisal camp," and Major Jackson was accused of an attempt to escape from Halle before his internment here last November, and while here he has also made an attempt to get away. The officers' quarters are in the casemates of the fort, and the rooms, as a rule, seem overcrowded. Major Jackson has a room to himself in the upper storey of the fort, and he said particularly that he did not care to have an effort made to have him transferred to another camp. He suffers from stiffness in his shoulder, caused by a bullet wound, and he would like, if possible, to be sent to some place in Switzerland for a cure in the event of an arrangement being made for the internment of prisoners of war in that country. Some of the rooms on the ground floor of the fort appeared to be damp, and all are rather dark, as is usual in buildings of this kind. The lighting is by oil lamps. The latrines are primitive and dark, but apparently not insanitary. The bathing and washing facilities are limited, but the water supply is to be increased by an artesian well, which is now being sunk. Formerly the officers were permitted to play tennis outside the fort, but that privilege has been stopped owing to attempts which were made to escape, and now their opportunity for exercise is limited to certain gymnastic apparatus, and to promenades on the walls of the fort itself, which are surrounded by a deep (dry) moat.

The officers receive the usual pay, according to their rank, and are charged at the rate of 1.50 M. per day for their food. Major Jackson said that he lived principally on what was sent him from home. But French and Russian officers, with whom I talked freely, said that they were able to live on the food supplied to them without having recourse to the canteen, which appeared to be very well stocked although there was some complaint in regard to prices. In my inspection of the fort, where I spent more than two hours, I was accompanied by the general commanding the Fortress of Cüstrin, as well as by the commandant of the "Gefangenenerlager," Major Jackson being with us most of the time. Before leaving I had "coffee" in the commandant's quarters, Major Jackson and a French officer being invited to join the party and sitting at the table with the German officers and myself. Some of the French officers who were sent here as "reprisal" prisoners, said that they preferred to remain rather than to be sent back to the camps from which they had come. In general the "atmosphere" of the camp was good; the German officers treat the prisoners like unfortunate comrades and the relations between the Germans and the prisoners appeared to be of the best. A number of officers expressed wishes in regard to matters of slight importance, of all of which the general made a note.

Enclosure in No. 37.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, October 12, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, with which was enclosed a copy of a note from the Foreign Office in regard to conditions prevailing at the officer's camp at Halle, and I beg that you will inform the British Government that this camp will again be visited in the near future.

The last report which you have received in regard to the camp in question was made, as you know, by Mr. Jackson on the 1st April. The camp, however, has been visited since that date. On the 30th July last, accompanied by Mr. Russell, I went to Halle for the third time, as on the occasion of my two previous visits I was informed that I could not speak to the British officers in English and out of the hearing of the camp authorities. On these two occasions, therefore, I left the camp without making an inspection.

The impressions which I got of the camp on the 30th July were on the whole far from favourable. The conditions were very much the same as those described in Mr. Jackson's report of the 1st April. Officers were housed in rooms containing as many as fifty-two persons, and none of the rooms struck me as being particularly clean.

It is true that certain minor improvements have taken place, but conditions in general remain much as they were. The situation of the camp, in the midst of a city, is not attractive, but I do not think it is unhealthy. The enclosure for exercise leaves much to be desired, and there seems to be no facilities for exercise other than walking. On windy days, we were told, the dust in the courtyard became very bad. There is no grass field of any sort, as there is at most officers' camps, where football or other games can be played.

The food is the same as that provided at other camps where officers are interned, and there were no complaints in regard to it, beyond the fact that it grows very monotonous.

There were many complaints in regard to the amount of time which letters written in the camp take to reach their destination, and I have also heard from other sources that such letters are often not posted at Halle, in many cases, until considerably over the usual ten days' time.

From time to time British officers have been transferred from Halle to other and better camps, and certain officers have asked the Embassy if they might be included among the persons so transferred. If I were in a position to inform the German Government that German officers in England are transferred from one camp to another at their own request, I should be hopeful of obtaining the same privilege for British officers here.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 38.

Dr. Ohnesorg and Mr. Osborne to Mr. Gerard.

Sir,

October 8, 1915.

WE have the honour to report that, on the 5th and 6th October, we visited the following camps for prisoners of war in Bavaria: Amberg and Bayreuth (men), and Kronach (officers).

Amberg.—In this camp there are two British prisoners of war, Privates James Humphries (King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry) and Alexander Mackenzie (Cameron Highlanders), both of whom have recently been moved from the detention camp near Nuremberg. The plan and organisation of the camp, which is on rising ground near some new Bavarian barracks, are similar to other camps in Germany, and the camp is built to accommodate 5,000 prisoners. At the time of our visit it contained only 2,500, the majority being French. Fifteen hundred of the prisoners were engaged in work, mostly agricultural, throughout the surrounding country. Private Mackenzie was one of those detailed to work in a neighbouring cre mine; Private Humphries has been released from working, as he is physically unfit because of an old wound in the chest. The only ground of complaint which he mentioned were the long hours which this work in the mine demanded. The prisoners, according to his statement, which was substantiated by the commandant, leave the camp daily at about 5 A.M. and return at 4 P.M., walking 7 kilom. each way. The commandant also informed us, however, that quarters for the workers were being constructed in the vicinity of the mine. A general inspection of the camp proved satisfactory.

Bayreuth.—The camp is situated on the outskirts of the city, on the military manœuvring field. The men are housed in wooden barracks, holding 150 men each; one-fourth of the buildings are at present occupied by a battalion of Bavarian troops, which would be removed, should the space be needed for other prisoners. An addition to the camp is contemplated, which will bring the capacity up to 5,000. Near the camp is a large compound containing wooden isolation barracks for possible infectious diseases, heretofore unused, but in which it is now intended to house wounded prisoners of war. No British prisoners were in the camp, but in a hospital in the town there were four lightly wounded British enlisted men. A large stone drill hall, within the limits of the garrison compound, is used for hospital purposes. Besides the four British, there were 104 other wounded in the building. The bedsteads were of iron, with comfortable mattresses; the place was clean; the care and treatment afforded the prisoners were good. Three of the British, i.e., Private Charles Green (Black Watch, wounded in right arm), Private James Watford (9th East Surreys, wounded in both legs), and Sapper Henry Turner (Royal Engineers, wounded in right thigh and left thumb), were captured on the 2nd October near Loos, placed on a hospital train, together with German wounded, and brought directly to Bayreuth. They all spoke well of their treatment, professional and otherwise. The fourth man, Private Patrick Corcoran (Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers), was convalescent from a wound received in November last. The wounded in this hospital are to be removed to the former isolation barracks, mentioned above, near the camp.

Kronach.—The detention camp for officers at Kronach is in the former fortress of Rosenberg, situated on a hill above the town, and commanding a fine view. Two wings of this huge citadel are used to quarter the interned officers, between two and five assigned to one room. There is no overcrowding; the rooms are all on the outside and, though a trifle dark, are clean and airy; there is a stove in each bedroom and artificial illumination is obtained from spirit lamps. Toilet and bathing facilities are good; shower-baths and tubs, with hot and cold water, have been installed and can be used practically when desired, as we were informed by the officers themselves. They mess together in one large hall. The only complaint about the food was that sausage was served too frequently at the evening meal. There is an excellent, small vacant ward to be used in case of sickness. There are facilities for exercise in the courtyards, on the ramparts, and on a newly made tennis-court; the suggestion was made to the commandant that the outer ramparts be included in the space allotted to the officers. Of the forty-eight officers interned here, three are English, i.e., Captain Reginald T. Miller (Manchester Regiment), Lieutenant Ed. W. S. Foljambe (Rifle Brigade), Lieutenant Chas. Gerard Irvine (King's Own). Eighteen enlisted Russians and four French soldiers are detailed as orderlies.

We have, &c.

Enclosure 2 in No. 40.

Report on Visit to Detention Camp at Bischofswerda.

THIS camp for officers was visited by Mr. John B. Jackson in May, and reported on. In regard to the general aspects of the camp, I can only substantiate his report. I found no evidence, through conversation with the British officers interned there, that their circumstances had become less tolerable—rather the reverse. Through subscription one of the tennis-courts has been put in first-class condition, and is now reserved for them alone; they are also now playing football in that part of the barracks mentioned by Mr. Jackson as “probably soon to be given over to the officers for use as a football ground.” A committee has been formed which now has some superintendence of the food, and on the 1st January, when the present contract expires, this whole matter will be in its hands. The British representative on the committee is Captain Lord James Stewart Murray, Cameron Highlanders.

The number of British officers is the same as at the time of Mr. Jackson's visit, namely forty-one; Lieutenant Anderson, of a Canadian regiment, recently escaped, but Lieutenant George T. Button, Oxford and Bucks Light Infantry, formerly at Festung Königstein, has been removed to Bischofswerda; there are accordingly no longer British at the former place.

The complaints which I heard were in regard to a recent ruling prohibiting the wearing of “shorts” for football as not being military clothing, and reducing the opportunities of taking baths to once a day. At my suggestion the commandant promised to allow “shorts,” and to permit an afternoon bath, if desired, at least as long as football is possible. There also seemed much dissatisfaction with the English interpreter, largely on account of apparent non-arrival and slowness of arrival of some letters from England; the commandant informed me that he had noticed the dissatisfaction and that he had already arranged for another interpreter who would arrive shortly.

In comparison to the two British orderlies at the camp when Mr. Jackson visited it, there are now five, and, following the request of the Canadians made through me, the commandant promised to endeavour to secure three Canadian orderlies from Giessen.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, October 15, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to enclose herewith a copy of a visit made by Mr. Jackson to the prisoners' camp at Schneidemühl yesterday, and in this connection I beg to inform you that a copy of the enclosure in the British Foreign Office's note to you of the 27th ultimo, which was transmitted in your letter of the 28th September, has been sent to the Imperial Foreign Office for such consent and reply as may be found appropriate.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 42.

Report on Visit to Detention Camp at Schneidemühl.

THE camp at Schneidemühl is located about 3 miles outside the city on higher ground, sandy soil, and surrounded by woods. It is built to accommodate about 30,000 prisoners, and was opened in September 1914. Its plan is not so regular as the newer camps, but the arrangement of buildings is good, and there is ample space for exercise. The buildings are lighted by electricity and heated by iron stoves, and there is water to be had throughout the camp. There are very few permanent sentries inside the camp, but a patrol goes through it nearly every hour or so. The administration of the interior of the camp is mainly in the hands of the prisoners themselves, and the canteen is run by them (Russian) entirely. The bathing facilities and latrines appear to be satisfactory. The latrines (trench system) are cleaned by the Russians. The camp was in quarantine all last winter (typhus and cholera), but has been free from disease since August.

At the time of my visit there were about 46,000 prisoners on the camp books, about 40 per cent. of whom were off (living outside) on working parties. In the camp there were 312 English with 174 more at work outside. About 200 of these men had been in the camp since October 1914, and most of the others I had seen during my visits at Zossen and Altdamm; 21 Englishmen had died in the camp since it was opened, mainly from typhus or cholera. All the members of the R.A.M.C. and several wounded men have been sent home. In the lazarets there were two Englishmen—one of whom is convalescing after an attack of pleurisy and who told me that he had no complaint to make of his treatment. The other man, Folwell, appears to have lost his reason, as he could make no reply to my questions. He was to have been sent back to England when the wounded left, but was unable to go because of an attack of dysentery. He is to be sent home when able to travel. Under arrest I found six men, who had appealed from the sentence pronounced against them because of an offence against discipline, and were awaiting their new trial. They were housed in pairs in small cells, and complained of lack of opportunity for exercise, and they said that the man (a Russian) who had acted as interpreter at their trial, had not been satisfactory.

The camp is divided into three unequal parts, in the first of which there were about 200 English, there being about 100 in the second, and none in the third. When I arrived a football match was going on in camp 1. I talked freely, out of hearing of the German officers and men, with the senior English non-commissioned officers and many of the men, and all agreed that there had been much improvement in conditions generally since last spring. The men who came from other camps in August were pleased at the change. They all said that they were treated in the same way as the prisoners of other nationalities. The senior British sergeant accompanied me in my rounds of camp 1. In it the English soldiers occupy three large huts by themselves, and there is no overcrowding. The sergeants told me that they would prefer to sleep apart from the men, but said that they had never asked for permission to do so. On my speaking of this matter to the commandant he said that it would be arranged. In camp 2 all the English occupy one large hut, and here again I talked freely with the men.

Although there were some complaints as to the time which it takes to get answers to letters sent to England, the post seemed to be operating regularly. Large numbers of parcels are received by the Englishmen, who claim—as usual—that they cannot eat the food provided (although I saw some of them doing it), and that they depend absolutely upon what is sent them and what they can buy in the canteen. In any event, all the men, Englishmen and others, looked in good physical condition. The evening soup, of which I ate a plate, was good, if not particularly attractive looking, and I can well understand the prisoners tiring of it, as of their generally monotonous life. None of the men had any important complaint to make of conditions as they now exist. They said that they would like to have unrestricted intercourse between the camps, but the commandant said that this could not be permitted, for disciplinary reasons. Individual permits to make visits are frequently granted, however, and football matches take place between teams belonging to the different groups.

Religious services were held in the camp by the Rev. H. M. Williams in September, and the men are in the habit of holding services of their own about twice a week.

Many of the men who were in the camp last winter have no longer any uniforms, and are wearing the black clothes furnished by the German authorities, and nearly all would like to have overcoats and boots. Some lists showing clothing requirements have already been forwarded, and others are to be sent in, but the men are rather uneasy owing to the regulation that clothing may not be sent by the War Office in bulk. In order to ensure clothing reaching the men for whom it is intended, it should be sent in parcels addressed to them individually through the Prisoners of War Help Committee, or some other similar body, or by private persons, and not through official channels.

THE camp is situated in the hills above the town in newly built barracks. The men are housed in the concrete stalls, which have never been used, and are scrupulously clean. The lazaret and offices, &c., are in the buildings built for the German non-commissioned officers' casino. The most notable features of this camp are the central steam-heating throughout, and the special building for washing clothes, containing tubs of hot water, a large wringing machine, and a drying room. These features I found repeated in other Saxon camps.

There are 6,000 prisoners at Chemnitz, though a large number are temporarily at work outside. This total is made up of about 1,000 Russian prisoners of war, 4,000 French prisoners of war, about 1,000 French civilians, and one Englishman, a civilian, Henry Lifton, of Birmingham, who was in permanent residence at Noyon, France, at the outbreak of the war. Mr. Lifton informed me that he had absolutely no complaints, and that he preferred staying at Chemnitz to being moved to a camp with other English. The commandant informed me that Lifton is employed as an interpreter.

Königsbrück.

This is a large camp, containing 15,000, its full capacity, situated among pine woods, on sandy soil, a short distance outside the town. There are only three British in the camp: Corporal William Taylor, 2nd Life Guards, No. 2488; Private Arthur Hart, 18th Hussars, No. 238; and Private William Leyland, King's Royal Rifles, No. 4944. None of these men had any complaints to make, except that there were so few English prisoners in the camp. Private Leyland, who was in the hospital being treated for abscesses on his leg, reported the medical attention he received all that could be desired.

The camp is complete in all respects and adheres to a high standard in regard to the kitchens, theatre, washing places, canteens, supply-room for clothing, &c. There is a particularly large establishment in this camp, where the prisoners can employ themselves in any useful or amusing trade which they wish, such as sketching, decorating, wood carving, &c.

Bautzen.

This camp contains about 3,200 prisoners, of whom over 2,000 are Russians. The men live in the cement stalls of some artillery barracks which were completed just prior to the war. In one half of each building the men sleep and in the other half they have their living room for the daytime, each man having a small cupboard and a special place at one of the tables. According to this arrangement, the men have less floor space for their mattresses, but they are not compelled to spend any of their time during the day in their sleeping quarters. This camp has a special disinfecting room, where garments are disinfected by being subjected to a temperature of 100 degrees Celsius. In most other camps which I have inspected the disinfection is done in special steam disinfecting machines.

In the canteen at Bautzen, as in that of Zwickau, hot coffee is kept on tap. This seems to be the arrangement in most camps. In other respects Bautzen is arranged and run similarly to other camps for men. It had a particularly well-arranged lazaret.

There are only two British prisoners of war at Bautzen: Corporal William Pike, Wiltshire Regiment, No. 8584, and Corporal Fox, Scots Guards, No. 8308, both of whom expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with the treatment accorded to them, only regretting that they were not in a camp with other English.

Zwickau.

At this camp there are two British prisoners of war: Private Robert Sheldrake, 1st Norfolks, and Driver Raymond Mansfield, Royal Horse Artillery, Battery L. The former has a crippled left arm, and expects to be included in the next exchange of incapacitated. The only complaints these men had to make were in regard to the insufficiency of the meat rations and the quality of the bread. The first is probably explained by the fact that all meat is finely minced and appears in the soup at the midday meal. I tasted the soup being prepared at the time of my visit and found it excellent in quality and evidently containing a considerable quantity of meat.

The camp is excellent in regard to organisation, &c.; the usual wooden barracks are clean and airy, there is plenty of space for exercise, the cooking establishments, the bathing facilities, the latrines, the lazaret, the canteen, are all adequate and well arranged; the theatre, which is just being completed, is particularly good. Zwickau also contains two features which I have neither seen nor heard of in any other camp in Germany: outside each barrack is a specially built stand where the mattresses are aired every day, weather permitting, and within the confines of the camp are several acres of vegetable gardens, which aid the general aspect of the camp and furnish light work for the prisoners, in which the French take particular interest.

Both Private Sheldrake and Driver Mansfield stated that they had received the best of medical treatment and care while they were still suffering from wounds, and the former expressed himself as particularly grateful for being allowed to live in one of the separate rooms with some French non-commissioned officers who spoke English.

Four thousand prisoners are at present assigned to Zwickau, of whom about 1,000 are now at work, mostly in agriculture, in the neighbourhood. The capacity of the camp is 6,000, which is soon to be increased to 10,000. French form by far the largest percentage of the prisoners, though there is also a large number of Russians.

Lauban.

This camp is comparatively small, holding at most 4,000, and is further reduced by the work-camps, where many of the prisoners now are. The numbers are about evenly divided between French and Russian; there are only thirteen English, nearly all from Irish regiments, of whom six were, at the time of my visit, absent at work. The complaints they made were relative to the quality of the food, which they said was dirty and badly cooked by the Russians, though the quantity was sufficient. They also requested information concerning non-commissioned officers having to work outside the camp. During my inspection of the kitchen I tasted the food, which seems not to justify the complaint as to its quality, though it was evident that it might become tiresome as a continued diet. The cleanliness of the kitchen left something to be desired, and the cleanliness of the Russian personnel something more. The commandant, when I mentioned the matter, said that half the kitchen force would be replaced by Frenchmen, and this arrangement, when I repeated it to the British prisoners, seemed to satisfy them. The commandant further stated that the non-commissioned officers would not be compelled to do work outside the camp, and would only be asked to do clerical work inside the camp. The British further stated that the English interpreter was sometimes sick or absent, and that their letters were delayed in leaving the camp. The commandant promised that a second English interpreter, who was in the camp, could be used to censor the letters of the British when the regular interpreter was unable to do it. The British, who live in two groups of six and seven, asked if the Russians housed with them might be removed, but this request the commandant, when I mentioned it, did not seem to regard as justifying fulfilment. The British also regretted that they were in a camp with so few of their countrymen.

The organisation and general arrangements of the camp are the same as in other camps. The barracks are newly built of wood, the latrines are sanitary, the lazaret clean and complete; there is a bathing and disinfection establishment and the other usual arrangements. On the whole, this camp did not impress me as favourably as others, though it is impossible to specify any particular feature in which it falls below the standard, with the exception of the kitchen.

On my way from the camp I saw and spoke to two of the British prisoners employed in the electrical plant of the near-by barracks; these men voiced the same complaints as the others, and, like them, stated that, aside from the points mentioned, their treatment was kind and satisfactory; they expressed themselves as glad to have an opportunity to work.

Strictly speaking, the camp at Lauban has at present no commandant; the gentleman whom I have mentioned above as the "Kommandant," a captain of the reserves, has been in charge since some time in September, when the former commandant gave up his post.

Görlitz.

This is a big camp of French and Russians, together with thirteen British prisoners. At present there are only a couple of thousand men in the camp, though its capacity is 14,000, which will probably be reached in the course of the winter, when the prisoners from the surrounding work-camps are brought in. Of the British, seven were in the camp, being non-commissioned officers from Irish regiments, formerly at Limburg; the six other men were at work-camps. The complaints of the seven non-commissioned officers with whom I spoke were concerning the quality of the food—a complaint not sustained by the thorough taste I gave the meal then being served—and concerning the difficulty of making themselves understood to the authorities and to their fellow-prisoners, since only one of them speaks a little French, and none of them German or Russian, and there is only one English-speaking interpreter in the camp; this complaint was coupled with the request to be removed to a camp where more British prisoners are interned. The question of the food again comes down to a matter of sameness, and to the difference between the Russian cooking and the British taste. One of the British had not been receiving certain packages of late, but he was certain that they had not arrived at the camp, as he had received packages from a different source in England.

The barracks at Görlitz are of a different form than any I have yet seen. They are much broader than the usual barrack, and the roof, instead of sloping gradually to a point, has an extra piece built into it, so that down the middle of the barrack the ceiling is more than half again as high as in the ordinary barracks; a much greater air space is thus given, and the windows built into the extra half-storey give an excellent opportunity for good ventilation without inconvenience from draughts.

The soil is more loamy than in many camps, and plank walks and roads have been built throughout the whole camp. There are the usual arrangements of all kinds in the camp, which in all details struck me as being exceedingly good.

Neuhammer.

There is here another big camp in which there were over 6,000 prisoners when I visited it, though over 4,000 more were expected the next day. They are practically all Russians. Neuhammer is the clearing-house for prisoners in Upper Silesia; there are 100,000 prisoners nominally assigned to it, many of whom have never been there, and many others who have been there only temporarily on their way to work-camps. There are seven British in the camp, including one Canadian, and there are fifty-five others who are assigned to the camp, but are at present living at work-camps. The only complaint the British prisoners in the camp laid before me came from three of them who had been moved from Schneidemühl to a mine and thence to Neuhammer, and whose parcels had not followed them; the commandant promised to write to the work-camp at the mine regarding the matter. They also complained of being too closely housed, but this proved to be because of the rebuilding of a barrack where they had formerly lived, and to which they are again to be removed. One of the British was suffering from tuberculosis; he was housed in a special barrack, where he said he received excellent treatment.

The camp at Neuhammer adjoins a camp where German troops are now in training, and a large number of the present buildings used for the prisoners are the barracks and stalls of a cavalry or artillery regiment. The two barracks, used by the soldiers in peace time are now occupied largely by the interned non-commissioned officers; there are in addition a number of brick stalls and another set of wooden stalls with cement floors where the men live. Those of wood have very small windows very high up, but in good weather the big doors can be folded back, as they were at the time of my visit, and more light and air is admitted than in regular barracks; this advantage would be a disadvantage in cold weather, but it is intended to remove the whole camp to three new camps being at present erected in the neighbourhood, and which will be capable of holding a total of 14,000 men.

Outside the usual arrangements and appliances of the camp, the lazaret deserves extra mention, if only on account of its size, as it contained 627 patients at the time of my visit, being the invalids from between 50,000 and 60,000 prisoners in Neuhammer and the neighbouring work-camps. The patients are divided among various barracks, newly built, each one according to the severity and nature of his illness. There are two German doctors in charge, with eleven Russian physicians and a large number of Russian sanitary personnel under them. The one British prisoner in the lazaret, suffering from a wrenched leg, said he had received entirely satisfactory treatment.

LITHGOW OSBORNE.

Berlin, October 18, 1915.

No. 44.

Sir Edward Grey to Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 27th ultimo,* transmitting reports by Mr. Lithgow Osborne on various internment camps in Germany, has the honour to request that an expression of his thanks may be conveyed to the United States Ambassador at Berlin for these interesting communications.

Sir E. Grey observes that at the camps visited by Mr. Osborne on this occasion there is none, with the exception of that at Neuhammer, at which the number of British soldiers interned exceeds thirteen, whilst at three camps (those at Königsbrück, Bautzen, and Zwickau) the numbers are three and two respectively. It is obvious that the situation of the British prisoners in these cases must necessarily be much aggravated by their isolation amongst such large masses of prisoners of other nationalities, with whom they are practically unable to communicate or to find themselves in complete sympathy, and that such is the fact is abundantly shown by the representations made to Mr. Osborne in this connection during his recent visits.

Sir E. Grey thinks that the German authorities will have no difficulty in appreciating the justice of the complaints put forward by the men if they consider what would be the position of a few German soldiers interned amongst large numbers of prisoners of alien race, say, for instance, with Ottoman troops, and he will be greatly obliged if Mr. Gerard will be good enough to bring the matter again to the notice of the German Government, with a view to bringing about the removal of such British prisoners as may desire it to camps where they will enjoy the advantage of associating to a greater extent with their fellow-countrymen.

No. 45.

Mr. Page, United States Ambassador in London, to Sir Edward Grey.—(Received November 4.)

THE American Ambassador presents his compliments to His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honour to transmit herewith enclosed a copy of a letter he has received from the Embassy at Berlin, dated the 26th ultimo, transmitting copies of reports on the camps at Crefeld, Wahn, Dülmen, Osnabrück, Friedrichsfelde, Herverst-Dorsten and Dorsten, and the lazaret at Wesel.

Enclosure I in No. 45.

Mr. Gerard to Mr. Page.

Sir,

American Embassy, Berlin, October 26, 1915.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith copies of reports of visits made by Mr. Jackson to the prisoner camps at Crefeld (officers), Wahn and Dülmen (men), and by Mr. Lithgow Osborne to those at Osnabrück (officers), Friedrichsfelde, Herverst-Dorsten and Dorsten (men), and to the lazaret at Wesel.

I have, &c.

JAMES W. GERARD.

Enclosure 2 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Crefeld.

THIS camp was fully described by the late Consul Michelson in a report dated the 10th April, 1915, and since that time it has undergone no material change. When visited by Mr. Osborne and myself on the 20th instant, it contained 740 officer prisoners of war of various nationalities, including 160 British officers, among whom is General Bruce. There are also 180 officers' servants, of whom thirty-nine are English. General Bruce and Colonel Bolton each occupy separate rooms; staff officers generally live in pairs, and junior officers occupy larger rooms in varying numbers. As some of the English officers objected to sleeping in rooms with those of other nationalities, because of differences of opinion in regard to ventilation, they had been permitted to move their beds into the corridors of the barracks. On speaking to the Commandant about this, he said that he was not authorised to allow the English to room by themselves, but on bringing this matter to the attention of the superior officer at Münster to-day, I was told that the desired arrangement would be permitted, both at Crefeld and at Gütersloh. At Münster I also spoke of clothing for the British soldiers, in regard to which there appeared to be some misunderstanding. The Commandant thought that these men should wear clothing furnished to them by the German authorities when their own is worn out, while the English officers would naturally prefer them to wear British uniforms. Letters to the Embassy on this subject had not been forwarded, but at Münster I was given to understand that the matter would be arranged satisfactorily. Mr. Osborne and I talked freely with all the officer prisoners who wished to say anything to us, and no complaint was made in regard to other matters. Mess charges had been reduced from 60 M. to 51 M. per month without change in the quantity or quality of the food, except that the allowance of butter, sugar, and milk was smaller than it had been, the alteration having been made to comply with the wishes of the officers—Russian and others—of limited means. The articles mentioned can, however, be purchased in the canteen, which appeared to be well stocked. In the parcel-room the arrangements showed that about half the total number of parcels received are for British officers. The health of the camp is good, and the general "atmosphere" seems satisfactory.

I tasted the men's food and found it very good, and all with whom I spoke said that they prefer to remain at Crefeld as officers' servants rather than to be sent to other camps.

October 21, 1915.

Enclosure 3 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Wahn.

IN a report dated the 18th April, 1915, the late Consul Michelson wrote at length in regard to the general character of this camp, which has not changed in the meantime. On the 20th October, when Mr. Osborne and I visited it, there were only about 5,000 men in the camp, but about 35,000 more, carried on its books, were absent on some 600 working parties of various sizes. Recently captured prisoners of war had not been brought into the camp itself, but had been sent forward at once to Giessen and other places. Most of the English prisoners (about 500) had been in the camp for a year or more, and all now occupy one block together. Many of these men are wearing clothing (often French or Belgian uniforms) which had been furnished by the German authorities. Every man has been given two suits of warm underclothing and such outer garments as have been needed. One man called attention to the pair of thin trousers which had been given to him in the summer, but on being questioned he said that he was wearing them in order to get a new pair. In the store-rooms there were large quantities of clothing of all kinds ready for use, and we were told that overcoats would soon be distributed to all who needed them. A considerable number (said to be 400) of dark British military overcoats were in stock. Boots, such as worn by German soldiers, have also been furnished. The general health of the men seemed good, and while there was more or less criticism of the food, of the usual kind, none of the men I saw looked in poor condition. Only six men, rheumatics or slightly wounded, were in the lazaret, and all said that their present treatment was good, as had been that in the hospital at Cologne. Prior to their arrival in Cologne, early in the war, they said that there had been some rough handling, but no discrimination between them and other prisoners. Many English soldiers are at work in the camp offices and parcel-room—a larger proportion than in any other camp which I had visited. I was told that a considerable number of parcels continue to arrive from England in bad condition, and there was some complaint in regard to delay in the receipt of parcels during the last few weeks, which is probably attributable to interrupted Channel traffic. Only one Englishman was at work, among many French and Russians, in the tailor shop, and at his request I asked that he might be given employment elsewhere, among comrades of his own nationality. The commandant gave an order at once for this to be done. A game of football was going on at the time of our visit, one of the players being Second Lieutenant C. Wells, now of the Dorsetshire Regiment, who had been promoted since capture from the Wiltshire Regiment, and who said expressly that he wished to remain where he is and not to be transferred to an officers' camp. We talked freely with Lieutenant Wells and many non-commissioned officers and men, and heard no important complaints. For our benefit the orchestra, thirteen of whose members are British bandsmen, played a selection from Gounod's "Faust," a young Frenchman and a Russian taking the vocal parts. In the camp there is also another orchestra, the members of which showed us stringed instruments which they had made themselves. A large riding hall has been arranged for theatrical performances.

Enclosure 4 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Jackson on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Dülmen.

THIS camp (see note from the British Foreign Office to the American Embassy in London of the 7th October) was opened in May, its capacity being 3,000, which is being increased to 5,000. On its books there are now about 700 British non-commissioned officers and men, among them being Lieutenant D. Condon, Northumberland Fusiliers, who was captured in non-commissioned uniform, whose promotion was formally notified to the German Government on the 25th September as advised in the British Foreign Office's note of the 21st, and who will probably be transferred to an officer's camp at an early date. The camp is in a healthy situation and well arranged, on the usual system. The English occupy large huts, housing from 120 to 140 men each, with small rooms for senior non-commissioned officers, of whom there are a good many in the camp who have been transferred from Senne. Eight Englishmen are at work in the kitchens, and they said that the food is good, although there was a certain amount of criticism of it by others. "Sick call" was going on at the time Mr. Osborne and I arrived in the camp, and waiting to see the doctor there were a number of English, most of whom complained of colds or had slight bruises or cuts received when at work. Men were apparently excused from work on very easy terms. Working parties leave the camp about 7 A.M. and return for the midday meal, going out again about 2 (after a two hours' rest), and returning again at sundown. Parties who work at some distance from the camp have their midday meal brought to them, but they are also allowed to rest for two hours. Under the circumstances the hours were longer in the summer than they are at this season, but the work cannot be called "hard labour," and is usually nothing more than "occupation." As it is understood that German non-commissioned prisoners are made to work in France, the French non-commissioned are compelled to do so here, and owing to what seemed to be a misunderstanding some of the British non-commissioned have also been sent to work. The commandant promised to correct this, however, upon his attention being called to it. A number of attempts have been made to escape from this camp, and at least two Englishmen have been able to get away. Prior to their successful venture, an attempt had been made by tunnelling, for which some twelve or fourteen men who had accepted the blame (and not sixty) had been punished, according to the story as told me by the senior British non-commissioned officer in the camp. The punishment for an attempt to escape is fourteen days' (increased to twenty-one for a second offence) solitary confinement, during which the fare for three days out of four is bread (900 grammes, or three times the usual allowance) and water. On the third day the prisoner receives the ordinary evening meal, and the next day he has the usual morning and midday meals, so that he is actually on bread and water only two days out of four. The cells are small but well ventilated, and there is an inclined plank bed without bedding which they may use both day and night. The punishment is of the same character as that given to German soldiers.

There were seven Englishmen in the cells when we visited the camp to-day, and I talked freely with all of them, and only one said that he felt badly as the result of his confinement. These men had overcoats with them in the cells, which they could wear or use as covering. All had made attempts to escape except one who had been sentenced to seven days' imprisonment for refusing to work at a dynamite factory. This work, as the men told me, was not in connection with the manufacturing or handling of explosives, but consisted of loading empty boxes on waggons and in preparing the foundations for a furnace. In the lazaret there were several slightly wounded men who had been recently captured, and who said that their treatment had been good. They had been brought from the front in a German Red Cross train together with German wounded, and had been treated in exactly the same way as the Germans. Most of the men whom we saw in this camp were well dressed in British uniforms. Clothing is distributed when required, and the senior British non-commissioned officer said that a list had been taken of all the men who had no greatcoats. The commandant said that these coats were to be distributed in a few days.

The huts are airy and clean, and there is the usual disinfection apparatus to remove vermin (lice) from the prisoners and their clothing, as men who come in from the trenches are apt to bring vermin with them. There are no Russians in the camp, and there have been no epidemics. The men are obliged to bathe once a week, but are permitted to do so more frequently. The mail, parcel, and banking arrangements are good. The prisoners may have any amount to their credit, but are not permitted to have more than 10 M. in their possession at one time.

We talked freely with the men as we went through the camp, and at length with the senior non-commissioned officers. On the road from Dülmen to the camp we saw a number of parties at work, and all the men were decently dressed and looked in good condition. One man (Private B. Matthews, No. 981, Welsh Regiment), has lost his left eye, and complains of pains in the head, but he is able to be about. He has been excused from all work, and his case is under consideration for exchange, although he is not strictly entitled to repatriation under the existing agreement.

Enclosure 5 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Osborne on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Osnabrück.

ON the 21st October I visited the artillery barracks at Osnabrück, where officer prisoners of war are interned, which was formerly inspected and reported on by Mr. John B. Jackson under date of the 5th April. There are now 400 officers at Osnabrück, but only eighteen British, as against twenty-five at the time of Mr. Jackson's visit, those mentioned by him as waiting for exchange having probably returned home; the four Indian officers are still there, and are all in one room. I understood that they wished to go to Zossen, where some of their own people are interned, as they have evidently now heard that there are officers as well as men there. This request can be taken up with the Ministry of War, and will probably be complied with.

The general arrangement of the camp was as described by Mr. Jackson, except that a further portion of the yard is now at the disposition of the officers, on which tennis courts have been constructed. The riding barn is used for a concert-room and theatre, and a rehearsal was in progress during my visit. The officers have a large dining-room and two smaller ones, used as a sitting-room and for afternoon tea. In one of these I had a cup of coffee with Colonel Christopher, the ranking British officer, while in the other a large number of French and Russian officers were having a German lesson from a professor from Osnabrück.

The sleeping rooms were clean and not overcrowded, though certainly filled to their capacity. The only complaint which the British had to make was in regard to the mixing of nationalities, the junior officers being entirely separated, each living in a room whose remaining occupants were of other nationalities. Colonel Christopher had had a room to himself, but recently a Russian lieutenant had been put in with him. I understood that a committee of officers had been formed to assist in the food question, and that the quality had been consequently improved. Owing to the camp being filled to its capacity, hot baths are possible at only stated intervals once in the week. Cold baths are, however, obtainable each morning.

I asked the commandant whether it was not possible to lessen the mixing of the nationalities (if it could not be done away with entirely) by putting three or four British together. He said he would try to do something of this kind, and that, if Colonel Christopher could not be given a room to himself, a French major, a friend of Colonel Christopher's, could replace the Russian lieutenant at present sharing the latter's room.

Berlin, October 26, 1915.

Enclosure 6 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Osborne on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camp at Friedrichsfeld.

ON the 22nd October I visited the camp for non-commissioned officers and men at Friedrichsfeld, near Wesel on the Rhine, which was visited by the late Mr. Michelson, former American consul at Cologne, and reported on by him under date of the 4th June, 1915. Since the time of Mr. Michelson's visit a few changes have taken place, but I found the camp in general as he described it. Its capacity has been increased to 35,000, although there were only 15,000 in it at the time of my visit, of which 300 were British; another 100 British were at work camps connected with Friedrichsfeld. The charged wire barrier dividing the camp, mentioned by Mr. Michelson, must have been done away with, as it was certainly not there when I inspected the place. There is a particularly large open space in the centre of the camp, where the men play football; I also saw them playing tennis on three or four courts, which had been marked out in the most convenient area, and some French were engaged in playing a game with a small rubber ball which they struck with their fists. The men who will not exercise of their own accord are given "setting up drill" to assure their general health.

The postal and package arrangements were as Mr. Michelson described them, only I imagine the volume of the work has increased owing to the increase in the number of men belonging to the camp. The barracks where the men live have brick walls, boarded over on the outside, and struck me as being very substantial. As opposed to the arrangement described in Mr. Michelson's report, the mattresses now occupy only the central portion of each barrack; an aisle is thus left down each side, about 12 feet wide, where the men have tables and benches. When I visited the barrack in which the English were all quartered they were seated at these tables eating, and apparently enjoying, their midday meal. It consisted of thick vegetable soup with square portions of meat served separately. I tasted the soup and found it, as the men admitted, very good; the meat looked clean and well cooked.

The camp lazaret is situated a quarter of a mile away and is in charge of a staff of young German doctors with French and Russian assistants. The barracks are clean and well heated by stoves and lighted by electricity. The cases are divided according to their nature and seriousness. The lazaret was by no means full, and the health of the camp is evidently very good. The head doctor informed me that there had been no deaths among the British. The English who were in the lazaret at the time of my visit were very satisfied with the treatment and care accorded to them, with the exception of one man who had been ill practically from the time of his capture, and who complained of the nature of the food. The Belgian assistant in this ward said that this patient was an irreconcilable. The head doctor informed me that he was not eligible for exchange, as there was no reason to believe that he would not ultimately completely recover his health. One other British private was worried because he had been given no medicine, but admitted that he was much better than when he had come to the lazaret a short time before. The establishment has suitable consultation and supply rooms, bathing arrangements, and closets with running water, and its own kitchen. Besides the lazaret there are several large isolation barracks, to be used in case of contagion.

I also visited the school spoken of by Mr. Michelson, and also a large new school, probably instituted after his inspection, where seriously wounded and crippled prisoners were being instructed in useful trades. Some of these were waiting for exchange, I understand, and others were not badly enough hurt to be eligible. Many were learning watchmaking and others bookbinding, &c. Several who had lost the use of their right arms were being given opportunities to learn to use their left arms for writing, &c. There were no British in this establishment.

When I spoke with the British I found the sum and substance of their complaints to be the matters of the quantity of the food and the supply of overcoats and shoes. The meal they were then eating did not bear out the first complaint, and I could not find evidence that it was better than the average. The names of the men who were in need of overcoats had been taken down, and the representative of the camp authorities who was accompanying me assured me that they would be given out within a week or two. The men who did not work outside the camp were furnished only with wooden shoes, though for the present those within the camp still had leather boots.

The question of securing underclothes, socks, trousers, and coats seemed to be satisfactorily taken care of.

I informed the commandant of the complaint of the men in regard to the food, but he seemed to think it unjustified and that the nourishment contained in the rations supplied was sufficient for maintaining the health of men not leading an active life. The good health of the camp, even among that part which does not receive parcels from home, would certainly seem to confirm this opinion. I further requested the commandant to give his attention to hastening the supplying of overcoats, which he intimated that he would do, though he seemed to regard the want as certain of early fulfilment.

Berlin, October 26, 1915.

Enclosure 7 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Osborne on Visit to Prisoners' Detention Camps at Herverst-Dorsten and Dorsten.

THESE are the names by which two work camps are known; the first lying between the villages of Herverst and Dorsten, and the second situated in the latter village. Both are offshoots of the concentration camp at Dülmen.

At Herverst-Dorsten I found about 700 prisoners, of whom 200 were English, and the rest French and Russian. They were lodged in some model working-men's houses, never before occupied, the British occupying a special group of houses. The sleeping accommodations are good, about nine or ten to a room; stoves in each room were being installed as I was there, and light is furnished by lamps. There is a closet in each house, and a special squad of men has the job of keeping this clean, with no further work to do. Each house has a small room about 7 feet square, built into it at the back, probably intended for a toolhouse, which now serves as a cell; a small grated window looks into the camp yard; the cell is furnished with a large quantity of straw, which seemed to me quite as comfortable as a straw mattress. One English soldier was serving a fourteen-day sentence for attempted escape, and another a shorter sentence for pretended sickness. As the men are outside of the camp for most of the day, the area enclosed is comparatively small; besides the houses where the men live it contains a partially open building for religious services, and a kitchen, brick-floored and clean, and with the usual large kettles and other cooking apparatus. The senior British non-commissioned officers informed me that the food had shown great improvement of late, and that it was superior to that in the concentration camps; this superiority is due to the extra rations allowed for men in work camps, I presume. The men are now working largely at agricultural jobs, leaving the camp at 6.30 and returning at 5, and having an hour's respite in the middle of the day, their meal at that time being cooked at the place where they work. There seemed to be no complaint about the present work, but the men had been employed in the coal-mine near the town, and had struck in sympathy with the French, some of whom had received the idea that they were making themselves liable to severe punishment in doing work in a mine. It also appeared that some of the British non-commissioned officers were being made to work. The names of the men needing overcoats had been noted, but there was uneasiness in their minds as to whether they would be forthcoming. I saw the stores of underclothing, trousers, and jackets, the latter of heavy dark material; there seemed to be no difficulty about obtaining these articles as needed. But the only supply of footwear in the camp consisted of wooden clogs, and the Oberleutnant temporarily in charge during the absence of the commander was ignorant of any possible additions to the supply in the way of leather boots, though the British there all are at present provided with these.

A large barrack outside the enclosure is for use in case of contagious diseases. There is a French doctor within the camp, but any serious cases are sent to Dülmen for treatment. The men get shower baths once a week at the bathing establishment at the coal-mine. In each house is a pump from which water is obtained for daily bathing purposes, and also for washing clothes.

At the smaller camp of Dorsten I found conditions less satisfactory. About 180 men are housed in one large room, a club-room in peace time, and on a small stage which adjoins it. Of these twenty are British non-commissioned officers and men. The floor space was badly overcrowded, though the great height of the room would probably bring the cubic air-space per man up to the requirement. The area enclosed also is too small, even considering the fact that most of the day is spent outside at work. The latrines are good, having running water. The kitchen is at the back, in some basement rooms, and seems satisfactory, though there were particular complaints about the food. This was the more inexplicable as the management of this camp is the same as that of Herverst-Dorsten, from where the supplies are each day fetched, and in which the food question seemed satisfactorily arranged. Parcels from England have come through regularly, though there have been delays recently. The washing facilities are adequate, but the space in which to make use of them is too limited. The men get a weekly bath in the town. The non-commissioned officers in this camp are also compelled to work.

I recommended to the temporary commandant the removal of some of the men from this camp, and he promised to reduce the number by at least thirty and to endeavour to include the British in this number. He also said he would investigate the rule as to non-commissioned officers doing work outside of the camp, as he had believed that British, like French, non-commissioned officers were not excluded from working. The complaints as to the food he did not think justified.

Enclosure 8 in No. 45.

Report by Mr. Osborne on Visit to Lazarets at Wesel.

ON the 22d October I visited two hospitals in Wesel, where prisoners of war are cared for, including 200 British non-commissioned officers and men, largely captured in the late days of September. In the Festungslazarett were a few over 100 men, and in the "Gymnasium," under the same general direction, there were a few short of that number at the time of my visit. The Festungslazarett was used for hospital purposes in peace times, and the main buildings now contain German wounded. The wounded prisoners of war are housed in a set of newly-constructed wooden barracks, of the usual size and shape, placed in the immediate vicinity of the older buildings. Each barrack contains a double row of cots, standing 5 feet apart and with a middle aisle of about 12 to 14 feet; in some cases another line of cots placed lengthwise runs down the middle of the building. There are windows at frequent intervals on both sides, and electric artificial lighting; the heat is furnished by stoves. In each barrack is a room containing supplies, and for consultations, &c.; in a second room the sanitary personnel sleeps. The barracks were all perfectly clean, and the general appearance of the bed-linen was clean and fresh. The British were divided among three different wards, and in my rounds I spoke to at least thirty. Many of them were very uncomfortable from their wounds, but all replied that their present treatment, as well as that which they had received at the front and on the way from the front, was, and had been, entirely satisfactory, and that they had nothing of which to complain. One man alone, well on the way to recovery, complained that the food was insufficient; others whom I questioned especially on this subject did not bear out this complaint, although in a similar state of health. All those consulted in regard to the matter said that they had come from the front on a German lazaret-train, together with German wounded, and that, as nearly as they could tell, they had received exactly similar treatment and care as accorded to the German wounded. Their only request was for books and tobacco.

The direction and management of the two divisions of the lazaret are the same, and this includes kitchen arrangements, &c. In a room of the main building itself were three wounded British officers, the ranking one being Captain Middleton, of the 7th Royal West Kents. Both he and his two companions gave the same report of their treatment as had the men. Everything possible had been, and was being, done for them. Their wishes were confined to English literature, of which they had obtained a certain amount, partly through a French priest. Everything else they wanted, including tobacco, it was possible for them to buy. In the same room was one wounded French officer, and also a slightly wounded French non-commissioned officer, who helped to attend to the officers, acting as a kind of orderly. The five beds took up a very small portion of the big room they were in, which was well lighted, naturally and artificially, and well heated.

Half a mile away a newly-built gymnasium (school) has been turned into a hospital for prisoners of war, for which purposes it is marvellously suited. The whole establishment is steam-heated, electric-lighted, and well ventilated and clean, and evidently easy to keep clean. The rooms are exceptionally high, and have many windows. The establishment is run as a separate unit, I understood; though it is under the same supervision as the Festungslazarett, it is certainly superior to either branch of that hospital. The British, who were for the most part, as at the Festungslazarett, from Scotch regiments, were likewise unanimous in their reports of their good treatment. As far as I could gather practically all were wounded on the same day, the 25th September, and were probably picked up and taken care of by the same general organisation. The men I spoke to included many from the Cameron Highlanders, and a few from the Black Watch. Several spoke of being first taken to the French hospital at Douai before being brought to Germany.

The medical and military staff in charge of these prisoners impressed me particularly favourably, and as though they were endeavouring to do everything possible to make their charges comfortable and to restore them to health, and as though they were exceedingly keen on their job.
